

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B
6186
9

3 2044 011 307 196

B
6186
9

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY

From the Library of
WILLIAM INGLIS MORSE

The Gift of his Daughter
MRS. FREDERICK W. HILLES

✓

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

PLATE I.

IL PRENCIPE DI NICOLO MACHIAVELLI. VINEGIA, 1540.

BROWN MOROCCO.

IO. GROlierii ET AMICORVM on upper cover.

PORTIO MEA DOMINE SIT IN TERRA VIVENTIVM on lower cover.

Actual size.

BOOKBINDING IN FRANCE

By

W. Y. FLETCHER, F.S.A.

Assistant-Keeper, Department of Printed Books, British Museum.

LONDON

SEELEY AND CO. LIMITED, ESSEX STREET, STRAND
NEW YORK, MACMILLAN AND CO.

B6186.9

✓

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

COLOURED PLATES

	PAGE
I. Il Prencipe di Nicolo Machiavelli. Vinegia, 1540	Frontispiece
II. Dionysii Areopagitæ Opera, Græce. Parisiis, 1562	to face 18
III. Valerii Maximi Dictorum Factorumque Memorabilium Libri IX. Antverpiæ, 1574	" " 34
IV. Voyages et Conquestes du Capitaine Ferdinand Courtois. Paris, 1588	" " 40
V. Novum Testamentum Græce. Amsterdami, 1633	" " 44
VI. Office de la Semaine Sainte. Paris, 1712	" " 65
VII. Les Grans Croniques de France. Paris, 1493	" " 67
VIII. La Sainte Bible. Cologne, 1739	" " 68

ILLUSTRATIONS IN THE TEXT

1. Opere del Petrarca. Vinegia, 1525	11
2. C. Suetonii Tranquilli XII Cæsares. Venetiis, 1521	13
3. M. Moschopuli de ratione examinandæ orationis libellus, Græce. Lutetiæ, 1545	15
4. Coustumes du Bailliage de Sens, &c. Sens, 1556	17
5. Histoire des Faicts des Roys, &c., de France, Par Paul Æmyle. Paris, 1581	22
6. Livre des Statuts de l'Ordre du Sainct Esprit. Paris, 1578	24
7. Devotes Contemplations sur la Vie de Jesus Christ. Par Louys de Grenade. Paris, 1583	26
8. Floriacensis vetus Bibliotheca Benedictina, &c., Opera Joannis à Bosco. Lugduni, 1605	28

	PAGE
9. J. A. Thuani Historia Sui Temporis. Parisiis, 1604	30
10. Pauli Æmylii Veronensis de rebus gestis Francorum libri X. Lutetiæ, 1577 .	32
11. C. Jul. Cæsaris Commentarii. Paris, 1564.	33
12. Œuvres Spirituelles du P. Estienne Binet. Rouen, 1620	35
13. Arms of Jacques Auguste de Thou	36
14. Arms of De Thou and his first wife, Marie Barbançon	37
15. Arms of De Thou and his second wife, Gasparde de la Chastre	38
16. C. Plinii Cæcilii Secundi Epistolarum Libri X. Lugd. Batav., 1640 . . .	39
17. Commentatio Explicationum Omnium Tragœdiarum Sophoclis, &c. Basileæ, 1556	48
18. Les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugene. Paris, 1671	49
19. 'What faith is the true one,' &c., MS.	51
20. Arms of Cardinal Mazarin	52
21. Caii Suetonii Tranquilli Opera. Parisiis, 1644	55
22. Claudiani Opera. Lugd. Batav. 1650	57
23. Arms of Madame de Maintenon	59
24. T. Lucretii Cari de Rerum Natura Libri VI. Lutetiæ, 1570	61
25. Arms of Countess de Verrue	63
26. Arms of Louis XV.	69
27. Arms of Mesdames de France	70
28. Ameto del Boccaccio. Firenze, 1529	72
29. Omaggio Poetico di Antonio di Gennaro, Duca di Belforte, &c. Parigi, 1768	75
30. Le mistere de la resurreccion de iesucrist. Par ichan michel. Paris . .
31. La grand danse macabre. Lyon, 1555.	97

FRENCH BOOKBINDING

CHAPTER I

Early bindings—Blind stamped ornamental work—First gilt bindings—Guild of St. Jean—Grolier—Geoffroy Tory—Francis I.—Henry II.—Diana of Poitiers—Catharine de' Medici, etc.

IN early times the French bindings, like those of other countries, were the work of the goldsmith and the carver rather than that of the bookbinder as understood by us. Rare and beautiful volumes, the joint production of the scribe and the artist, were incased in befitting covers of the precious metals, enamel, or ivory, which were often enriched with gems or crystals. They formed part of the treasures of a king, a church, or a monastery. Later on, when princes and nobles began to take an interest in literature and the fine arts as well as in the profession of arms, manuscripts became more common, and these costly bindings were to a very great extent superseded by those of cloth of gold, velvet, and satin; leather being employed for books of lesser value. With the invention of printing another change took place: books were produced in such large numbers that it became necessary to find less expensive materials for their covers, and leather of various kinds, more or less decorated with blind stamped ornamental work, came into general use. Many of these impressed leather bindings are of great beauty; those of Jehan Norins, Louis Bloc, André Boule, and R. Macé being especially good.

Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Anne of Brittany, successively the wife of both these kings, were the great collectors of books, printed as well as manuscript, of this time. Hardly any of these precious volumes retain their original bindings, but one bearing the arms of France and Brittany, together with the hedgehog, the badge of Louis, is exhibited in the French National Library.

The glories of French binding, however, really date from the introduction of the art of tooling in gold into Europe. Although this craft was first practised in Italy, it was quickly imitated by the French binders, who soon excelled all others in the beauty and quality of their work; and from the beginning of the sixteenth to the middle of the eighteenth century the binder's art in France, fostered by the kings and queens and the great collectors of that country, reached and maintained a degree of excellence which has never been surpassed. The superiority of French binding may be also attributed to some extent to the influence of the Guild of St. Jean, a community which appears to have been established in Paris as early as the year 1401, and did not cease to exist until the time of the Revolution, when it was suppressed by a decree of the Assembly. It embraced and controlled all persons who took part in the production and sale of books, and included binders as well as scribes, illuminators, printers, and booksellers.

It is difficult to determine whether the French binders learnt the art of tooling in gold from Italian craftsmen who took up their abode in France while Grolier was in Italy, or from the workmen whom he is said to have brought with him on his return to his native land; but there is no doubt that the development of the art in France was mainly due to the inspiration and patronage of this famous collector. Jean Grolier, Vicomte d'Aguisy, was born at Lyons in 1479. In 1510, at the age of thirty-one, he succeeded his father, Etienne, in the office of Treasurer of the Duchy of Milan, and he resided in Italy, with some interruptions, until 1529, when the French troops were withdrawn from that country. During his stay there he made the acquaintance of Aldus Manutius, the "scholar printer" of Venice, and assisted both him and his successors with money in the production of the beautiful volumes which issued from their press. In recognition of his kindness special copies of these books, several of which were dedicated to him, were printed for his library, and were also probably bound in their workshops.

In 1524 Grolier was sent by Francis I. on an embassy to Pope

Clement VII., and in 1545 he obtained the reversion of the post of Treasurer-General of France, to which he succeeded some two years later, and held until his death, which occurred on the 22nd of October 1565, in the midst of his books, at the Hôtel de Lyon, near the Buci Gate in Paris.

Grolier's library, which was one of the finest of the time, consisted of 3,000 volumes, about 350 of which are known now to exist. Sixty-four are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, about thirty in the British Museum, principally in the library bequeathed by the Rev. C. M. Cracherode, fifteen in the Bibliothèque St. Geneviève, left to the library by Archbishop Le Tellier, and seven in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal. Many are also to be found in the private libraries of this and other countries. His books, as far as the bindings are concerned, may be divided into two classes—those bound for him, and those which were already in that condition when he acquired them. On all those in the first class his liberal and well-known motto, IO. GROLIERII ET AMICORUM, will, with very rare exceptions, be found, and he also placed it on those in the second when he could do so without damaging or disfiguring the binding. He also wrote it with numerous slight variations—as many as thirteen are known—in the interior of his volumes. This inscription is almost always stamped on the upper cover, while a part of the fifth verse of the one hundred and forty-second Psalm, PORTIO MEA DOMINE SIT IN TERRA VIVENTIU, generally occurs on the lower. He did not, however, confine himself to this motto. TANQUAM VENTUS EST VITA MEA, from the seventh verse of the seventh chapter of Job, and CUSTODIT DOMINUS OMNES DILIGENTES SE, ET OMNES IMPIOS DISPERDET, a portion of verse twenty of the one hundred and forty-fifth Psalm, were occasionally used. The arms adopted by him when a bachelor were three bezants or surmounted by three stars argent on a field azure. After his marriage in 1516 he impaled those of his wife Anne Briçonnet. On a few of his volumes is found an emblem of a hand, entwined with a scroll bearing the words ÆQUE DIFFICULTER, issuing from a cloud and striving to pull an iron bar from the ground on the top of the highest of a number of mountains, probably the Alps. This only occurs on his earlier books, and is believed to refer to some special event of his life

Grolier's books are mostly bound in morocco, fine skins of which he took great pains to procure from the Levant, but they are occasionally covered with calf. Those which he acquired in his earlier years, during his residence in Italy, were bound in that country, probably, as has been already stated, in the workshops of Aldus and his family, and they possess all the characteristics of Italian work of the time. Some of the volumes which he added to his collection after his return to France bear marks of having been bound there; the arabesque tooling being barred or azured¹ instead of solid like that on the Italian bindings. (See the beautiful example figured in Plate I.)

It would seem, however, that many of the later Aldine books belonging to Grolier, printed after he left Italy, were still bound at Venice, as their covers are ornamented with precisely the same stamps as those used on the earlier ones; bound copies being probably sent to him direct from the printers. But of course it is also quite possible that these stamps may have been brought by him from Italy to France and used there.

Although almost all the bindings executed for Grolier have a strong family resemblance, there is very considerable variety in the styles of their decoration. That most generally used consists of a geometrical pattern combined with arabesques, either solid, azured, or in outline only, in gold tooling; the ornamentation being occasionally coloured. Sometimes we find the geometrical design without the arabesque work, or the arabesque work without the geometrical design. The effect is always excellent, and the bindings well merit the encomium bestowed upon them by Noël Bonaventure d'Argonne, who wrote under the pseudonym of Vigneul de Marville, in his Mélanges d'Histoire et de Littérature, printed at Paris in 1725. After remarking on the beauty of the paper and the elegance of the covers of the Grolier volumes, he adds, "It would seem as if the Muses who had contributed to the composition of the contents had also applied themselves to the decoration of the outsides of the books, so much of art and esprit appears in their ornamentation. They are all tooled with a delicacy unknown to the gilders of to-day. The compartments, painted in various colours, are perfectly well designed, and of many different forms."

¹ So called from the colour blue in heraldry being represented in this manner.

After Grolier's death his books were divided among his heirs; the greater number, partly by heritage and partly by acquisition, becoming the property of Méry de Vic, Keeper of the Seals under Louis XIII. They remained in the possession of his family until 1675, when they were sold by public auction. As late as the commencement of the present century the prices paid for the Grolier volumes were very low. In Antoine Augustin Renouard's Catalogue de la Bibliothèque d'un Amateur, printed at Paris in 1819, mention is made of a letter to the author from James Edwards, the well-known London bookseller and collector, who writes: "M. Renouard,—If any of the beautiful volumes of Aldus, in 8°, with Grolier bindings, should fall into your hands, I beg you to reserve them for me; I will give you a louis for each of them." Renouard replied: "M. Edwards,—If any of the beautiful volumes of Aldus, in 8°, with Grolier bindings, should fall into your hands, I beg you to reserve them for me; I will give you six guineas for each of them." At the Téchener sale in 1888 a Grolier binding enclosing a copy of the History of Ethiopia by Heliodorus, printed at Basel in 1552, fetched the high price of 12,000 frs. Grolier also possessed a large number of gold and silver coins, medals, and various antiquities, which after his death were purchased by Charles IX., who added them to the collection at Fontainebleau. They were unfortunately pillaged in 1576 during the civil war which raged in France at that time. Grolier was a statesman, a financier, a scholar, and an antiquary as well as a bibliophile; and Erasmus, who enjoyed his friendship, in a letter written in 1518, describes him as a man possessing all good qualities and all the virtues in a well-formed and vigorous body. He extols his civility, his modesty, his integrity, and his munificence, and calls him the patron of scholars and an ornament of France.

Although it may be conjectured with a considerable amount of probability that many of Grolier's books were bound by or under the immediate superintendence of Aldus and his successors, little or nothing is really known of their binders, or the artists who furnished the beautiful patterns which decorate their covers. Geoffroy Tory, the famous writer, artist, engraver, and printer, mentions, in his Champfleury, a work which treats of the art and science of the due and true proportion of letters, that he was employed by Grolier to design some letters for him, which it is thought may be those used on his bindings ; and it is also considered likely that Tory may have had some share in their ornamentation. The two bindings, however, in the so-called Geoffroy Tory style which still exist, one being in the British Museum and the other in the French National Library, were bound some time after Tory's death, which probably occurred in 1533, for we hear of his business being carried on by his widow in 1534, who in the succeeding year transferred it to Olivier Mallard. Tory himself was a most excellent binder. He used for the decoration of his bindings two stamps of very elegant arabesque ornamental work, in which is introduced the famous pot cassé. These stamps are in the Italian style, and are of different sizes, the smaller having only the pot cassé, which he appears to have taken from the Hypnerotomachia of Poliphilus (Francesco Colonna) ; while in the larger stamp the vase is pierced by a wimble, or auger (toret). He seems to have adopted this latter device, which also occurs in the interior of his books, accompanied with the motto NON PLUS, on the death of his dearly loved daughter, Agnes, which took place, he tells us, on the 26th of August 1522, when she was ten years old, less one day. In his Champfleury he explains that the broken vase is our body, which is a vessel of clay, and the wimble is fate, which pierces alike both strong and weak. "Premierement en icelle y a ung vase antique qui est casse, par le quel passe ung Toret. Ce dict vase et Pot casse signifie nostre corps, qui est ung pot de terre. Le Toret signifie Fatum, qui perce & passe foible et fort." The toret is also probably a punning device on his name. Fig. 1 is a representation of a binding by Tory, preserved in the library of the British Museum. The material is brown morocco, and the stamp upon the covers has the pot cassé without the wimble. The book is a copy of the works of Petrarch, printed at Venice in 1525.

Francis I., who was said by Angelo Boccha to be "non minus litteris, quam armis clarus," was a great patron of the fine arts, and especially delighted in handsome bindings. Those executed for him are rare, few being in existence, save the examples preserved in the French National Library. The British Museum possesses but one, which is bound in calf (see Fig. 2). In some cases the sides are decorated with a semis¹ of his initial and fleurs-de-lis; while others are ornamented in the Grolier style. They almost always bear the arms of the king, as well as his device, a salamander in the midst of flames, accompanied with the motto

¹ A design consisting of the repetition of one or more small stamps at regular intervals.

Fig. 1.—Opere del Petrarca. Vinegia, 1525.
Brown morocco, $8\frac{1}{2}$ in. by 6 in.

NUTRISCO ET EXTINGUO. This emblem was adopted for him when young by his tutor, Arthus de Gouffier Boisy, Comte d'Estampes, and he used it throughout his life. His binders were Etienne Roffet, called Le Faulcheur, and Philippe le Noir. Some of his books are believed to have been bound by Geoffroy Tory.

Marguerite d'Angoulême, Queen of Navarre, shared the tastes of her brother, Francis I., and possessed some beautifully bound volumes.

The decorations on the superb bindings of the books which belonged to Henry II., and of those which he gave to his beautiful and accomplished mistress, Diana of Poitiers, Duchess of Valentinois, have long been a puzzle to the antiquary, and have given rise to much controversy. The covers of many of the volumes which formed the library of the king, and of those which belonged to the duchess, are alike adorned with the royal arms and the crowned initials of the king, as well as the interlaced crescents and the bows and arrows—devices of Diana. They are also stamped with what is believed to be her initial united with that of Henry. It is thought by some, who doubt whether the king would have allowed his initial to be linked in so open a manner with that of his mistress, that these letters are not HD but HC, and constitute the cypher of the king and his queen, Catharine de' Medici ; but it will be found on examination that on all the bindings where the combined initials of Henry and his consort occur the Cs are completely formed, and project considerably beyond the sides of the H, forming a monogram differing greatly from that on the binding of which a representation is given in Fig. 3, where, as will be perceived, the strokes of the Ds do not extend beyond the strokes of the H. It ought, too, to be noted that this cypher is never crowned. The monogram also occurs, accompanied with both the arms of the king and his mistress, on the architectural decorations of the residence of the latter, the famous château of Anet, which she built with money given to her by Henry, and where she kept her library. In addition to this, Giovanni Capello, the Venetian Ambassador to the Court of France, in an account of the first audience given to him by Henry II., states that the king had publicly assumed this cypher, in which both the crescent moon, and the double D could be traced, in honour of his mistress. It would certainly appear from these facts that the monogram was that of the king and Diana ; but, on the other hand, on an enamel by Léonard Limousin, Catharine is represented wearing a necklace in which it occurs ; and in 1575, long after the death of her husband and Diana, the queen caused the crescents and the bows and arrows to be introduced into the decorations of the painted windows of the Sainte Chapelle at Vincennes. It would naturally be supposed that if she really regarded these devices as those of her husband's mistress they would be very distasteful to her, and she would not have allowed them to be used. To add to the difficulty, many of the letters of the king to Diana are signed with this perplexing monogram. There is no doubt, however, that when Catharine arrived in France to marry Henry, then Duke of Orleans, she found her position to be one of great delicacy. Henry was devoted to his mistress, whom he styled his "seule prinse," but Catharine, young as she was—for she had not reached her eighteenth year—had been trained to maintain entire control over her feelings and actions, and instead of exhibiting anger or resentment endeavoured to make a friend of Diana, who on her part evinced her diplomacy by showing the utmost deference to the queen, and by paying unremitting attention to the health and welfare of her children; a line of conduct which caused her to be regarded in the royal household as the tutelary genius of the family—a curious and characteristic illustration of the morality and manners of the time.

Fig. 2.—C. Suetonii Tranquilli XII Cæsares. Venetiis, 1521.

Brown calf. With the arms, device (a salamander), and initial of Francis I.
6½ in. by 3¾ in.

The example of a binding bearing the royal arms as well as the devices of Diana, given in Fig. 3, to which allusion has already been made, is a particularly interesting one. The material is citron morocco, the sides of the book being ornamented with the supposed monogram of Henry and his mistress, interlaced crescents, and fleurs-de-lis; having in the centre of a panel, formed by a border of a corded pattern, the arms of the king, his initial, and a crescent, enclosed by bows tied together with ribbons; the bows and the crescent are painted white. On the upper cover the border of the panel is stamped in dark, and the arms in light-coloured gold; on the lower the colours are reversed. The title of the work occurs on the top of the upper side. The back is ornamented with the crowned H in light and fleurs-de-lis in dark-coloured gold, and the edges of the leaves are gilt and gauffred,¹ the devices of the king and Diana being also impressed upon them. The book formerly possessed bosses and clasps. The work enclosed by this very beautiful binding is a copy in Greek of De ratione examinandæ orationis by M. Moschopoulos, printed at Paris in 1545, and was bequeathed to the British Museum by the Rev. C. M. Cracherode in 1799.

Some of Diana of Poitiers's books have on their bindings her arms impaled with those of her husband, the Count de Brezé, who died in 1531. A splendid volume bearing them, and also ornamented with military trophies, the monogram of Henry and Catharine, the crowned

¹ Stamped with an ornamental pattern.

Fig. 3.—M. Moschopuli de ratione examinanae orationis libellus, Græce. Lutetiae, 1545.
Citron morocco ; with devices, &c. of Henry II. and Diana of Poitiers.
10¼ in. by 6½ in.

initial of the king, the cypher of Diana, the interlaced crescents, etc., is exhibited in the French National Library. Another book, a copy of Ptolemy's Geography printed at Lyons in 1541, with an equally beautiful binding, adorned with crescents, and with the name of Diana stamped within a cartouche in the centre of the cover, is preserved in the same collection. After the fatal day when Henry met Montgomery in the lists, Diana retired to Anet, where she died on the 23rd of April 1565. Her library remained in the château until 1723, when it was sold by auction.

On a few of the bindings executed for Henry, his motto, DONEC TOTUM IMPLEAT ORBEM, occupies the place of his arms; and occasionally his portrait stamped in gold is found on the covers of the volumes which belonged to him. One with this decoration is exhibited in the British Museum. The book is a copy of the Coustumes du Bailliage de Sens, printed at that place in 1556. It contains the autograph of the king. (See Fig. 4.)

During the reign of Henry the external embellishment of books assumed an exceptional importance. The decorations were designed by the great artists of the time, and were carried out by the professional gilders upon leather. Jehan Foucault and Jehan Louvet were the two most celebrated gilders of this period, but there is no evidence to show that they exercised their craft upon the ornamentation of bindings. The king himself appears not to have disdained to occupy his leisure hours with this work, for a little chest covered with leather, bearing in the midst of the tooling with which it is ornamented the words Omnia vincit amor. Rex me fecit 1556, is exhibited in the Louvre.

The love of Catharine de' Medici for choice books and for beautiful bindings—a love which she shared with the princes of the house of Medici, as well as her father-in-law, Francis I., and her husband Henry II.—has been sung by Ronsard :—

Ceste royne d'honneur de telle race [i.e. Medici] issue

• • • • •

Pour ne degenerer de ses premiers ayeux,
Soigneuse, a fait chercher les livres les plus vieux,
Hebreux, grecs et latins traduits et à traduire;
Et par noble despense elle en a fait reliure
Son chasteau de Saint Maur, à fin que sans danger
Le François fust vainqueur du sçavoir estrangeur."

A considerable portion of her library, which was a very fine one, was obtained in a very characteristic manner. The story of this acquisition is to be found in Brantôme's Vies des Capitaines Étrangers.

Fig. 4.—Coustumes du Bailliage de Sens, &c. Sens, 1556.
Brown morocco, painted and gilt ; with portrait of Henry II. $9\frac{1}{2}$ in. by $6\frac{1}{4}$ in.

“This famous captain”—Brantôme is speaking of the celebrated Marshal Strozzi, who was killed at the siege of Thionville in 1558—
“was a great lover of letters, and possessed a very choice library. . It could not be said of him, as Louis XI. remarked of one of the prelates of his realm, who had an excellent collection of books which he never saw, 'that he resembled a hunchback who has a fine hunch on his back, but never beholds it.' The marshal often visited and read his books, which principally came to him from Cardinal Ridolfi, by purchase on the death of that ecclesiastic. They were so rare and choice that they were valued at more than 15,000 crowns. But when Strozzi was killed, the queen-mother took possession of the library, promising to recompense his son, and to pay for it some day. He never received a sou, and I well remember his telling me how sore he felt about it."

Catharine's books for the most part are very richly decorated, and she evidently employed the best artists of the time for her bindings. The ornaments are greatly varied, but the covers most frequently bear the arms of France together with a monogram formed of an H and two Cs, surmounted with a crown. A crowned K is also generally to be found upon them. After the queen became a widow the volumes occasionally have her arms, surrounded by the cordelière des veuves, stamped or painted upon the sides; and she sometimes used a symbolic device expressive of her feelings—a heap of quicklime on which drops of rain are falling, accompanied with the motto ARDOREM EXTINGUITUR VIVERE FLAMMA. They [raindrops, signifying tears] show that the heat [of love] lives, though the flame be extinct; for water poured upon lime causes heat without flame. Hilarion de Coste, in his Éloges sur les Vies des Reines, des Princesses et des Dames Illustres, printed at Paris in 1647, states that she also adopted a broken lance for her emblem, with the words LACRIMÆ HINC, HINC DOLOR. A few of her bindings have a semis of tears.

The binding given in Plate II. is a very beautiful example from the library of the queen. The volume, one of three containing the works of Dionysius the Areopagite, printed at Paris in 1562, and bequeathed to the British Museum by the Rev. C. M. Cracherode in 1799, is bound in olive morocco, the sides being decorated with a coloured geometrical design in gold tooling combined with arabesques; in the centre of each cover are painted the arms of the queen, encircled by the cordelière des veuves. The panels of the back bear a crowned K, and the edges of the leaves are gilt and charmingly gaufréd.

PLATE II.

DIONYSII AREOPAGITÆ OPERA, GRÆCE. PARISIIS, 1562.
 OLIVE MOROCCO. WITH ARMS OF CATHARINE DE' MEDICI.
Actual size.

The library of Catharine de' Medici, which she kept in her châteaux of Chenonceaux, in Tourraine, and St. Maur, near Paris, was one of the most important of the time. It contained more than four thousand printed volumes, besides a large number of Greek and Latin manuscripts of great value. The queen, when she died in 1589, was deeply in debt, and it was not without much difficulty that these literary treasures were preserved to France. The books were in danger of being seized by the creditors, sold and dispersed, but they were saved by the exertions of Jean Baptiste Benciveni, Abbé de Bellebranche, the queen's chaplain, who took possession of them, and retained them until De Thou, the famous historian, who had recently succeeded Amyot, Bishop of Auxerre, as keeper of the library of the king, obtained letters patent which enabled him, after the lapse of some time, to place them with those committed to his charge, Francis Pithou and others having previously reported that they were worthy to be preserved in France "for posterity, for the maintenance of good literature and honour of the kingdom; and because it would be impossible to obtain or collect such a library in these days at any price or in any country." To prevent any further difficulties, the greater number of the books, when deposited in the library of the king, were rebound with the royal arms to show that from thenceforth they were the property of the Crown. This fact accounts for the few bindings now in existence which belonged to this queen.

CHAPTER II

Étienne Roffet—Francis II. and Mary Stuart—Charles IX.—Nicolas Eve—George Drobet—Clovis Eve—Lyons School—Henry III.—Mary of Cleves—Louise of Lorraine—Henry IV.—Marguerite of Valois—Mary de' Medici—De Thou—Various Collectors—Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria—Macé Ruelle—Gaston, Duke of Orléans.

THE great artist, or artists, who designed, and the skilful craftsmen who bound and tooled the magnificent bindings which adorned the libraries of Henry II., Catharine de' Medici, and Diana of Poitiers are all unknown. As their work came to a somewhat sudden termination, it is surmised that they may have been Huguenots, and were obliged to leave the country in consequence of the persecutions to which they were subjected, but there is really little foundation for this conjecture. Étienne Roffet was the binder of Henry II. as well as Francis I., but we are not able to connect his name with any work performed for the first-named monarch. Of Francis II. only a few bindings are known. Dying in the eighteenth year of his age, he had not time to form a library, but he collected a small number of books which have impressed on their sides a gold dolphin, plain or surmounted by a crown. Guigard, in his Armorial du Bibliophile, mentions a volume containing the Ordonnances royaux sur le faict de la justice, printed in 1539, which appears to have been the joint property of Francis and his wife, Mary Stuart, as the covers bear a stamp of two crowned dolphins with a fleur-de-lis and thistle between them. When Francis became king the arms of France replaced the dolphin, the covers being also studded with crowned Fs and fleurs-de-lis.

Of Charles IX. rather more bindings are in existence. His books generally bear on the upper cover his arms, accompanied with two Cs, interlaced and crowned; and on the lower his device of two columns entwined with a scroll inscribed with the words PIETATE ET JUSTITIA.

A magnificent example with these decorations was shown by Earl Spencer at the Exhibition of Bookbindings at the Burlington Fine Arts Club in 1891. The volume which it adorns is a folio copy in Greek of the Orations of Demosthenes, printed at Paris in 1570. Claude Picques was binder in ordinary to the king, but, judging from the style, this binding was probably executed by, or under the superintendence of, Nicolas Eve, who about this period is believed to have commenced those masterpieces of decoration which exercised so potent and so lasting an influence on the bibliopegistic art of the time.

These charming bindings, which are profusely covered with intertwining lines interlaced with graceful branches of foliage, are known as fanfare bindings, and owe their designation to a book entitled Les Fanfares et Courvees Albadesques des Roule-Bontemps de la haute et basse Coquaigne, et dependances, which belonged to Charles Nodier, the eminent collector, upon the covers of which Thouvenin, one of the most eminent of modern French binders, has reproduced a design of this character. Although it is not possible, with absolute certainty, to connect these rich and beautiful works of art with either the name of Nicolas or Clovis Eve, there is a binding in the British Museum (see Fig. 5) bearing the arms of Henry III., ornamented at the corners in this style, which may safely be considered to have been bound by Nicolas Eve, or at least to have been executed in his workshops, for it must not be forgotten that, according to the custom of the time, the Eves were booksellers as well as binders, and it is quite possible that they were neither actually binders nor gilders themselves, but that the glory of having executed the marvellous bindings ascribed to them belongs to the skilful gilders whom they employed to decorate their books, whose names are unknown, and will probably remain so.

The Eves, Nicolas or Clovis, were the royal binders during the reigns of Charles IX., Henry III., Henry IV., and Louis XIII. The relationship of Clovis to Nicolas is uncertain: by some he is believed to be the son of Nicolas, by others his brother.

As has been already stated, many bindings are attributed to Nicolas Eve which cannot be positively proved to be his, but in Fig. 6 a representation of a binding is given which is known from reliable evidence to be his work. In 1579 Eve was charged with the binding

Fig. 5.—Histoire des Faicts des Roys, &c. de France, Par Paul Æmyle. Paris, 1581.
Brown morocco ; with arms of Henry III. 15¼ in. by 10 in.

of forty-two copies of the statutes of the Order of the St. Esprit, which had been recently instituted by Henry III., and mention of this commission is found in the Clairambault Manuscripts (Vol. 1231, fol. 91 and 108), where we read : "A Nicolas Eve, laveur et relieur des livres et libraire du roy, 47 escus et demi, pour avoir lavé, doré et réglé sur tranche 42 livres des statuts et ordonnances de l'ordre, reliez et couverts de maroquin orange du Levant, enrichis d'un costé, des armoiries de S. M. pleines dorées, de l'autre de France et de Pologne, et aux quatre coins des chiffres, et le reste de flammes avec leurs fermoirs de ruban orange et bleu, suivant l'ordonnance de M. le Chancelier du 26 et quittance du 27 décembre, 1579, cy XLVII escus et demy." The sum charged for binding these volumes enables us to form some estimate of the remuneration then paid to binders for their work, as the ecu of France in 1579 was equivalent to seven shillings English money of the same period, and probably worth fifty or sixty shillings of the present time.

The binding is a particularly handsome one, and, with the exception of the loss of the "fermoirs de ruban orange et bleu," is in as good condition as when it left the binder's hands. Time has changed the "maroquin orange du Levant" into a rich warm brown, a very great improvement on the original colour. In the centre of the upper cover are impressed the arms of Henry III. (France and Poland), surrounded by the collar of the Order of the St. Esprit, and surmounted by a crown bearing the motto MANET ULTIMA CÆLO; above and below and on either side of the arms occurs a representation of the dove, the emblem of the Holy Ghost. The lower cover bears the arms of France. The sides of both covers are studded with fleurs-de-lis and "tongues of fire" arranged alternately, a crowned monogram of the king and his queen, Louise of Lorraine, being placed at each corner. The back is thickly decorated with fleurs-de-lis, and the edges of the leaves are gilt.

The book is very handsomely printed on fine vellum, each page being ruled with red lines. Another copy, bound precisely in the same manner, is preserved in the French National Library.

There is little doubt that this edition of the statutes of the Order was printed by Eve, or under his immediate supervision, for a portion of the type used is exactly the same as that employed in the Traité des Mesadventures de Personnages Signalez. Traduict du Latin de Jean Boccace par Cl. Witart, Escuyer, Sieur de Rosoy, etc. This little book was published by Nicolas Eve at Paris in 1578, and on the title-page he styles himself "Relieur du Roy, demurant au cloz Bruneau, rue Chartiere, à l'enseigne d'Adam et Eve." In the Privilège du Roy

Fig. 6.—Livre des Statuts de l'Ordre du Saint Esprit. Paris, 1578.
Orange morocco. Bound by Nicolas Eve. $9\frac{3}{4}$ in. by $6\frac{1}{2}$ in.

allowing him to print the book or to have it printed, he is described as "Marchand Libraire en l'Université de Paris, & Relieur ordinaire du Roy." The date of the death of Nicolas Eve is not known, but it was probably earlier than 1592, for in that year we find George Drobet describing himself as "Relieur du Roy" in several books issued by him at Tours. Drobet appears to have been succeeded by Clovis Eve, unless they held the post conjointly, as in a devotional work, entitled Le Thrésor du Prières, Oraisons et Instructions Chrestiennes pour invoquer Dieu en tout temps, published by Clovis Eve at Paris in 1596, he calls himself "Relieur ordinaire du Roy." He also was binder to Gaston d'Orléans, and in the household accounts of that prince there is an entry of a payment to him of thirty-three livres, dated the 17th of June 1628, for binding a Missal and a Book of Hours in "maroquin de Levant," with a semis of fleurs-de-lis.

Clovis Eve died about the end of the year 1634 or the beginning of 1635.

A large number of bindings were executed about this period at Lyons, but with some exceptions they were very inferior to those done in Paris. Many of the decorations used were produced by single stamps. As these were well cut, and the patterns were frequently imitations of the work of the best gilders of the time, the result was often satisfactory, but of course the adornment of these commercial bindings cannot be compared with the beautiful tooling, worked out bit by bit by means of small engraved stamps, which we find on the books bound by such artists as the Eves and Le Gascon.

Henry III. was a great lover of fine bindings, and it is said that he possessed some skill as a binder himself. Many of his books are known by the lugubrious and religious emblems adopted by him for their decoration—emblems in strange contrast with the dissoluteness of his life and manners. A death's-head, the badge of the Order of Penitents, to which the king belonged, frequently occurs both on the sides and on the backs of the volumes, accompanied sometimes with the motto MEMENTO MORI, but more commonly by SPES MEA DEUS; while in the centre of the covers a representation of the Annunciation or the Crucifixion is frequently impressed (see Fig. 7). Other bindings bear the implements of the Passion, and some have a semis of tears. These devices are believed to have been used by Henry, then Duke of Anjou, to show the deep grief which he felt at the sudden death of Mary of Cleves, Princess of Condé, to whom he was greatly attached. On the covers of one of his books we find a monogram formed of the initials of the princess enclosed with two wreaths, and on the back a death's-head between two tears, with the touching inscription MORT M'EST VIE.

When he became king his bindings assumed a somewhat more

Fig. 7.—Devotes Contemplations sur la Vie de Jesus Christ. Par Louys de Grenade. Paris, 1583.

Olive morocco. Bound for Henry III. $4\frac{3}{4}$ in. by $3\frac{1}{4}$ in.

cheerful aspect. They almost always bear the arms of France and Poland (he was king of the latter country before he ascended the French throne) surmounted by a crown, which generally bears the motto MANET ULTIMA CÆLO. His initial occurs below the arms, which, before he instituted the Order of the St. Esprit, are surrounded by the collar of the Order of St. Michel only, subsequently by the collars of both Orders.

After his marriage with Louise of Lorraine, who herself possessed a number of splendidly bound books, he frequently used a cypher composed of the letters H. λ λ. (Henri Louise Lorraine).

Her Majesty the Queen possesses a very beautiful volume from the library of this sovereign. It is bound in brown morocco, and the covers, which are very elaborately tooled, bear the arms of the king, surrounded by the collars of the Orders of St. Michel and the St. Esprit, together with his crowned initial. The book is a folio copy of De la Connaissance et Merveilles du Monde et de l'Homme, by Pierre de Dampmartin, printed at Paris in 1585. It is dedicated to Henry, and was probably bound by Nicolas Eve.

The books of Henry IV. are generally plainly bound in morocco, with the arms of France and Navarre, surrounded by the collars of St. Michel and the St. Esprit in the centre of the covers; accompanied with the initial of the king, with a crown above and the number IIII. beneath it. Some vellum bindings which belonged to this monarch, and were probably bound by Nicolas or Clovis Eve, are masterpieces of rich and delicate tooling. A representation of one of these charming works of art is given in Fig. 8.

A very fine large-paper copy of the first eighteen books of De Thou's Historia Sui Temporis, once the property of James I., King of England, is exhibited in the British Museum. The binding, which was probably executed by Clovis Eve, is of red morocco, the arms of Henry being impressed in the centre of each cover. The sides are also ornamented with crowned fleurs-de-lis and the initial of the king; the back being decorated alternately with the royal cypher and the fleur-de-lis, each surmounted by a crown (Fig. 9). This is believed to be the copy of his History which the author presented to James I. In the letter which accompanied the book, De Thou, in begging the king to accept his work, states that it will be conveyed to him by the French ambassador, and that he has not ventured to offer it to his majesty without the express command and permission of his own king. These circumstances may account for the binding bearing the arms and cypher of the French monarch. Henry possibly had the book specially bound for James, or he may have allowed De Thou to take a copy from the royal library, of which he was the keeper. The

*Fig. 8.—Floriacensis vetus Bibliotheca Benedictina, &c., Opera Joannis à Bosco.
Lugduni, 1605.*

Vellum ; with arms of Henry IV. 7 in. by 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ in.

French ambassador, who was a son of the President de Harlay by a sister of De Thou, sent the following letter to his uncle, giving an account of the presentation of his book :—

“Sir,—I have presented your letter, with your book, to the king, who received it with such remarks of esteem for the author, and has since spoken so highly of it in public, that you have every reason to be satisfied with his approbation, and to console and fortify yourself by his testimony against the attacks of envy and calumny by which I understand you have been assaulted from various quarters. The king promised me that he would answer your letter, with the style of which he was extremely pleased. He has perused your dedication of your history to his Majesty King Henry, and said that it was one of the finest pieces of writing he had ever read, not excepting the works of antiquity, and sincerely, for my own part, the more I read it the more I find my admiration of its beauties increased. You have undertaken a great work, as worthy of your free and courageous spirit as the slavery of the age in which we live is unworthy of it. I think you will do well for the present to defer printing your materials down to the year 90 [1590], for I should fear you would not be able to resist the opposition of those who are chagrined to see their fathers marked with disgrace. King James is about to send a gentleman to the Court of France, upon the death of Madame de Bar. I will endeavour that he shall carry his majesty's thanks and a letter to you. I now humbly kiss your hands, and shall pray God, sir, to grant you, with health, a long and happy life.

“Your obedient nephew and servant,

“DE HARLAY.

“LONDON, March 10, 1604.”

The following is an extract from the letter written by King James to De Thou :—

“With respect to your book, we have not as yet had leisure to read more than half of it, and that cursorily ; but we have, nevertheless, plainly discovered the ability of the author, and have received much delight from the perusal, as well on account of the style as the matter. We are particularly gratified in observing that, conformably to the advice you give others, partiality, the too common bane of history, is

Fig. 9.—J. A. Thuani Historia Sui Temporis. Parisii, 1604.
Red morocco; with arms and initial of Henry IV. 17 in. by 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ in.

banished from your work. What we have seen increases our desire to have the sequel of so admirable a composition, and we entreat and require you to gratify in this respect the eager curiosity of your friends. Be assured, M. le Président, no one will be more desirous to acknowledge and honour your merit and virtue than “Your affectionate friend,

“JAMES R.

“Dated WESTMINSTER,

“March 4, 1603 [1604].”

The sequel of the work, however, did not obtain the approbation of James. He was especially dissatisfied with the account of certain events in his mother's life, and engaged Sir Robert Cotton to prepare a memoir in her defence. De Thou was deeply sensible of the difficulties attending this portion of his history, and in 1608 addressed a letter to the eminent historian and antiquary William Camden, in which he writes: “The historian's province, if he be resolved to do his duty, is indeed a painful one, for the law of history obliges him not only to say nothing false, but to be bold in delivering the whole truth.”

Marguerite of Valois, daughter of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici, and first wife of Henry IV., inherited from her father and mother an ardent love of books. Her library contained a very considerable number of choice volumes, principally bound in morocco. The covers have a semis of marguerites, or are ornamented with branches of laurel, palm, or olive, and floriated spirals in the style attributed to Nicolas and Clovis Eve, with the addition of marguerites, and sometimes the motto SPES MEA. The British Museum possesses a fine example of a binding, decorated in this style, which belonged to Marguerite. It is a copy of De Rebus gestis Francorum by Paulus Æmylius, printed at Paris in 1577. Brown calf is the material used for the binding, the sides and back being ornamented with branches of palm and olive. Marguerites are also introduced in the decoration. It was probably bound by Clovis Eve (Fig. 10).

The exquisite little volumes tooled with a border of palm and laurel branches enclosing a number of small floral oval compartments, each containing a marguerite or other flower, and having in the centre of the upper cover a shield charged with three fleurs-de-lis on a bend, a similar shield with three lilies accompanied with the motto EXPECTATA NON ELUDET occurring on the lower cover, have been generally associated with the name of this queen. M. Guigard, however, points out in his

Fig. 10.—Pauli Æmylii Veronensis de rebus gestis Francorum libri X. Lutetiæ, 1577.
Brown calf. Bound for Marguerite de Valois. 13 in. by 9 in.

Armorial du Bibliophile that they were more probably bound for Marie Marguerite de Valois de Saint-Rémy, daughter of a natural son of Henry III. Tradition asserts these bindings to have been executed in the workshop of Clovis Eve, and it is most likely right (see Fig. 11).

Fig. 11.—C. Jul. Caesaris Commentarii. Paris, 1564.
Brown morocco. 5 in. by 3½ in.

Mary de' Medici, the second wife of Henry IV., resembled her predecessor in her love for letters and the fine arts, and many of the books which belonged to her have bindings of remarkable richness. Some are tooled in the Eve style, while others are decorated with a semis of fleurs-de-lis; or of her cypher alone, or associated with the fleur-de-lis. They almost always bear her arms—the arms of France and Tuscany—surrounded with the cordelière, the sign of her widowhood, and accompanied by a monogram formed of either the letters M. M. (Marie Medicis) or M. M. H. (Marie, Medicis, Henri). Fig. 12 represents a fine binding in brown morocco executed for this queen. The book which it adorns is a copy of Recueil des Œuvres Spirituelles du P. Estienne Binet. Dediées à Jésus Christ, et à sa tressainte Mère, et à la Royne Mère du Roy, printed at Rouen in 1620. It was purchased by the British Museum in 1838.

Among the great collectors of books and patrons of binding of the latter half of the sixteenth century and the beginning of the seventeenth, Jacques Auguste de Thou stands pre-eminent. He was born at Paris on the 8th of October 1553, and was the son of Christophe de Thou, Chief President of the Parliament of Paris, and his wife, Jaqueline Tuleu de Céli. Christophe de Thou himself possessed a fine library, which contained several books presented to him by Grolier as tokens of his gratitude to him for having saved his life and honour at a very critical period of his official career. This library he bequeathed to his son, who had already inherited a considerable number of books under the will of his uncle, Adrian de Thou, who died in 1570. These two collections formed the basis of Jacques Auguste de Thou's splendid library, which for forty years he never ceased to augment both by the purchase of several of the most celebrated libraries of the time and by the acquisition of single works, so that it finally contained not less than a thousand manuscripts and eight thousand printed books. Some of their bindings are very beautifully and elaborately ornamented in the fanfare manner (see Plate III.), but by far the greater number are of plain morocco, vellum, or calf, with the De Thou arms impressed in the centre of the covers.

As De Thou was twice married, his arms varied considerably. When a bachelor they were :—Argent, a chevron between three gadflies sable.

PLATE III.

VALERII MAXIMI DICTORUM FACTORUMQUE MEMORABILIVM LIBRI IX.

ANTVERPIÆ, 1574.

RED MOKOCCO. WITH ARMS OF JACQUES AUGUSTE DE THOU.

Actual size.

His name occurs on a scroll placed below the escutcheon, the whole being enclosed by two branches of laurel (Fig. 13). Later he added a mono-

Fig. 12.—Œuvres Spirituelles du P. Estienne Binet. Rouen, 1620.

Brown morocco ; with arms of Mary de' Medici. $9\frac{1}{2}$ in. by $6\frac{3}{4}$ in.

gram formed by the letters I. A. D. T. (Jacques Auguste de Thou). These arms and cypher he used until his marriage with Marie Barbançon, daughter of François, Seigneur de Cani, which took place in the year 1587, when he added his wife's arms, gules with three lions crowned argent, to his own, and composed his cypher of the letters I. A. M. Θ.

Fig. 13.—Arms of Jacques Auguste de Thou.

(Jacques, Auguste, Marie, Thou), the theta being made by the intersection of the A and the M (Fig. 14).

Marie Barbançon died in 1601, and in the following year De Thou married his second wife, Gasparde de la Chastre, daughter of Gaspard de la Chastre, Comte de Nançay, captain of the bodyguard of the king, whose arms superseded those of Marie on the shield; and the monogram was changed to one consisting of the letters I. A. G. Θ. (Jacques, Auguste, Gasparde, Thou), the theta in this case being formed by the intersection of two G's and the transverse portion of the A (Fig. 15).

This illustrious historian, statesman, and bibliophile died on the 7th of May 1617, after a long and painful illness, but his library was ever a great solace to him, and he preserved the faculties of his mind unimpaired to the end. On the last day of his life he wrote some Latin verses, in which he deplored the state of his health, and asks why he should linger still upon the earth and continue to try remedies which are worse than the disease. "Rather let me strive," he adds, "by pious prayers to attain heaven; that life which approaches to the likeness of death is not worth preserving.

Quid jam amplius moramur in terrestribus,
Graviora morbo et experimur remedia?
Tentanda cœlo per pias preces via:
Nec vita tanti est, tamdiù, ut vivas, mori.

De Thou was very anxious that his books should not be sold and dispersed after his death, and with a view of preserving his library in perpetuity in his family he inserted the following clause in his will:—

"Bibliothecam meam XL amplius annorum spatio magnâ diligentia ac sumptu congestam (quam integram conservari non solum familiæ, sed etiam rei litterariæ interest), dividi, vendi ac dissipari veto."

His children when they grew up faithfully endeavoured to carry out his wishes, and his eldest son, François Auguste, Keeper of the Royal Library, a man of great erudition, took charge of the books until his death on the 12th of September 1642, when he was beheaded at Lyons for his alleged participation in what was called the conspiracy of Cinq-Mars.

The bindings of the books acquired for the library after the decease of its founder are simply stamped with the De Thou arms, and a monogram composed of his initials and that of his wife Gasparde, whose death occurred in the year 1616, shortly before that of her husband. A very charming example of one of these bindings, executed by Le Gascon, is represented by Fig. 16. The second son, Achille Auguste, having died in 1635, the third son of the historian, who bore the same Christian names as his father, became by inheritance the owner of the library, which he enriched with many additions, and especially augmented it with the fine collection of his father-in-law, Hugues Picardet, a distinguished bibliophile. In 1660 De Thou received the title of Baron de Meslay. He died in 1677, when all these literary treasures became the property of Jacques Auguste de Thou, Abbé de Samer-aux-Bois et de Souillac, who three years later was obliged, in consequence of heavy losses experienced by the family, to dispose of this magnificent collection. It was purchased by Jean-Jacques Charron, Marquis de Menars, who acquired the whole of it, with the exception of a portion of the manuscripts, which passed into the library of the king. In 1706 the Marquis sold it to the Bishop of Strasburg for the sum of 40,000 livres, who bequeathed it with all his other books to his nephew, the Prince de Soubise. It was finally dispersed in 1788.

Fig. 14.—Arms of De Thou and his first wife, Marie Barbançon.

Fig. 15.—Arms of De Thou and his second wife, Gasparde de la Chastre.

Among other collectors of this period who possessed books re-

Fig. 16.—C. Plinii Cæcilii Secundi Epistolarum Libri X. Lugd. Batav., 1640.

Red morocco ; with the De Thou arms. $5\frac{1}{4}$ in. by 3 in.

markable for their bindings were the Constable Anne de Montmorency ; Antoinette de Vendome, wife of Claude de Lorraine, first Duke de Guise ; Catharine de Bourbon, Duchess d'Albret, sister of Henry IV. and wife of the Duke de Bar ; Louis Charles de Valois, Count d'Auvergne and Duke d'Angoulême, natural son of Charles IX. and Marie Touchet ;

Peter Ernest Count de Mansfeldt, the celebrated general of Charles V., and his son Charles.

The books of Louis XIII., before he became king, most frequently bear his arms as Dauphin of France, the covers being studded with alternate rows of dolphins and fleurs-de-lis; a double lambda being placed at the four corners. After he ascended the crown they were generally ornamented with a semis of fleurs-de-lis, either alone or in conjunction with his initial ensigned with a crown. He used the same arms as his predecessor, the H being replaced by an L. Some charming bindings decorated with very beautiful and delicate tooling, and bearing the crowned initials of himself and his queen, Anne of Austria, are ascribed to Macé Ruet, who succeeded Clovis Eve as the royal binder. A representation of one of these bindings is given in Plate IV. On certain of these books, in a small centre panel, is a monogram of the letters H and D. Guigard, in his Armorial du Bibliophile, considers that these may possibly be the initials of Henry IV. and Gabrielle d' Estrées, and show that the volumes belonged to that king and his mistress before they passed into the library of Louis XIII.

Anne of Austria was also a great lover of books, and displayed great taste in their bindings. These she had tooled in a variety of ways. Some of them have a semis of fleurs-de-lis only; others have a monogram consisting of two As (one inverted) or a single A in combination with the fleurs-de-lis. Nearly all the covers bear the arms of the queen encircled with the cordelière, indicating that the volumes were bound after the death of her husband. The bindings which date from the early years of her reign do not essentially differ in style from those of Mary de' Medici.

Gaston, Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIII., possessed two libraries, one at Paris and the other at Blois. His volumes were bound in morocco or calf; a double G, with or without a crown, being stamped in the centre and at the corners of the covers.

PLATE IV.

VOYAGES ET CONQUESTES DU CAPITAINE FERDINAND COURTOIS.

PARIS, 1588.

OLIVE MOROCCO. WITH INITIALS OF LOUIS XIII AND ANNE OF AUSTRIA.

Actual size.

1
5
11
17
23
29
35
41
47
53
59
65
71
77
83
89
95
101
107
113
119
125
131
137
143
149
155
161
167
173
179
185
191
197
203
209
215
221
227
233
239
245
251
257
263
269
275
281
287
293
299
305
311
317
323
329
335
341
347
353
359
365
371
377
383
389
395
401
407
413
419
425
431
437
443
449
455
461
467
473
479
485
491
497
503
509
515
521
527
533
539
545
551
557
563
569
575
581
587
593
599
605
611
617
623
629
635
641
647
653
659
665
671
677
683
689
695
701
707
713
719
725
731
737
743
749
755
761
767
773
779
785
791
797
803
809
815
821
827
833
839
845
851
857
863
869
875
881
887
893
899
905
911
917
923
929
935
941
947
953
959
965
971
977
983
989
995

P
P

mac tree ance being ratio and 1 then sign
C

CHAPTER III

Le Gascon—Florimond Badier—Antoine Ruetle—Peiresc—Louis XIV.—Marie Thérèse—Sir Kenelm Digby—Cardinal Mazarin—Nicolas Fouquet.

FOREMOST among the bindings of the seventeenth century are those attributed to the mysterious Le Gascon, a personage at one time considered to be so mythical that even his very existence was regarded as uncertain. Documents, however, have lately been discovered which leave no longer any doubt on this point. In the register of the Guild of St. Jean, now preserved in the French National Library, is an entry of certain payments made to him in the year 1622 for materials used in binding a missal for the use of the Guild.

“Au Gascon, pour une peau de maroquin incarnat pour relier le missel du Concile, in fol., que la Compagnie du Sieur Chappelet et consors ont donné en blanc à la Confrairie 4*l.* 10*s.*
Pour un sinet pour servir audit missel 3*l.* 10*s.*
Pour une bazane pour une housse audit missel 0*l.* 7*s.*”

As no charge is specified for binding the volume, Le Gascon probably made a gift of his work to the Guild, of which he was most likely a freeman. The fact that he was chosen to bind a book of this importance shows that so early as the year 1622 he enjoyed the reputation of being a skilful craftsman. The same manuscript contains a further notice of the volume, which is described as “bound in red morocco, doré à petits fers,¹ and covered with a case of violet sheep-skin.”

This missal was used by the confraternity for twenty-three years, when it was replaced by a new one, presented by Gilles Dubois, on resigning the office of Master of the Guild. Several references to Le Gascon are also to be found in the correspondence of Peiresc and Dupuy. Peiresc having complained to Dupuy that Le Gascon had badly cropped a book which had been given to him with other volumes to be folded, beaten, and cut, so that they might be more readily sent through the post, Dupuy, in a letter to Peiresc, dated 12th of April 1627, expresses his surprise that Le Gascon should have committed this fault, "car il est assez scrupuleux." In another letter written by Peiresc to Dupuy, dated the 12th of February 1629, reference is made to a copy of the works of Tertullian, bound by Le Gascon, which Peiresc intended sending to a cardinal residing in Italy; and François Auguste de Thou, the son of the historian, writing to Dupuy on the 25th of February 1629, from Alexandria, makes mention of a very beautiful copy of the Koran which he had bought there, adding, "la reliure vous plaira, et je m'assure que Le Gascon s'étudiera d'imiter la dorure."

¹ Small hand-tools used in gilding and binding.

While these extracts amply prove the existence of Le Gascon, and also show that he was a binder as well as a gilder of books, they give no clue as to his identity. M. Gruel, in his Manuel Historique et Bibliographique de l'Amateur de Reliure, is inclined to believe that Le Gascon is identical with Florimond Badier, a binder who is thought to have come from Gascony to Paris, where he was apprenticed in 1630 to Jean Thomas, a gilder, and who became a master binder in 1645. M. Gruel brings forward many arguments in support of this view, and considers that the form of the compartments, and the arrangement of the petits fers on the bindings ascribed to Le Gascon, are the same as the ornamentations which are found on those bearing the name of Badier. This he states to be particularly the case with respect to the little coupé head executed in pointillé work, that is, by a dotted instead of a solid line, which is so frequently introduced in the decoration, and which has been often accepted as the mark—indeed as the likeness—of the artist.

Monsieur Thoinan, in his Les Relieurs Français, on the other hand, comes to a different conclusion. He considers Le Gascon and Badier to be different persons, but maintains that the coupé head is the signature of the latter binder. If he be right, it follows that all the pointillé bindings with this distinguishing mark, and indeed all others in the same style as those which bear the head, are the work of Badier, and not of Le Gascon. Only two bindings signed by Badier are known—the very fine one on the De Imitatione Christi, printed in 1640, and preserved in the French National Library; and that which ornaments a copy of Les Plaidoyez et Harangues de Monsieur Le Maistre, printed at Paris in 1657, and dedicated by the editor, M. Issali, to Pomponne de Bellièvre, Chief President of the Parliament of Paris, whose monogram is stamped on the outside of the covers, and arms on the doublure.¹ At the bottom of the lower doublure occur the words BADIER FACIEB., which give so great an interest to the binding. The book was purchased at the Destailleur Sale at Paris in 1891 by Mr. Christie-Miller, of Britwell Court, Bucks, who has kindly allowed the writer of this article to compare the binding with the beautiful examples attributed to Le Gascon preserved in the British Museum, and the result of a very careful investigation leads him to the conclusion that they are not the work of the same hand, the Badier tooling lacking the extraordinary finish and refinement of that on the Le Gascon bindings, and giving the impression of being only a close and clever imitation of that great master's ornamentation. MM. Marius-Michel, in their work La Reliure Française, regard the binding of the De Imitatione Christi, which is signed FLORIMOND BADIER FECIT INV., also as the work of an imitator of Le Gascon, the tooling being heavy and irregular; and M. Thoinan himself allows that, while it is decidedly skilful, it is wanting in the certainty of handling which is so apparent in the other bindings he assigns to Badier. He endeavours to account for this by stating that it is evidently an early production of this binder, but it will be noticed that the date of the printing of Les Plaidoyez et Harangues de Monsieur Le Maistre is as late as 1657, and the binding of this volume is decidedly inferior to that of the Imitatio.

It is also highly improbable that Badier would so ostentatiously have affixed his name to these two bindings, and have omitted to sign others of much greater excellence, had he executed them.

The dates of the printing of the books upon which the bindings attributed to Le Gascon are found undoubtedly constitute a difficulty in ascribing these beautiful works of art to that binder. By far the greater number of the volumes were published after 1640, and although it is true that the date of the printing of the little New Testament depicted in Plate V. is 1633, and that of another work preserved in the British Museum, Chacon's Historia utriusque belli Dacici a Trajano Cæsare gesti, etc., which has a magnificent binding with elaborate pointillé tooling, is as early as 1616, they may both have been bound some time after they were printed. As we have seen, Le Gascon was evidently a binder of repute in 1622, and it will naturally be asked what the bindings were like which he executed between that date and 1640. This is a very difficult question to answer. Possibly the beautiful bindings in the style of those bearing the initials of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria (see Plate IV.), hitherto ascribed to Macé Ruette, were Le Gascon's work, for some of the tools used for their decoration have a very strong resemblance to those employed by him. This however is only conjecture. The mystery still exists, and we can only hope that before long some document may be discovered which will explain it.

¹ The inside of the cover when lined with leather.

Whatever his name may have been, the craftsman who produced these splendid bindings, so artistically designed and so elaborately tooled, was a great master of his art. The time and labour expended upon them must have been immense. At the present day it would probably cost not less than one hundred pounds in time-work alone to faithfully copy the marvellous tooling on the binding of Chacon's History to which we have referred. The material used by Le Gascon for his bindings is red morocco of a somewhat peculiar tone, frequently inlaid with leather of various colours, surrounded and embellished with his delicate tooling.

It would indeed be difficult to surpass the exquisite taste and the extraordinary precision of the tooling on the binding of the little New Testament given in Plate V. The ornamentation is almost entirely au pointillé, and its disposition is incomparably happy.

Many splendid examples of his work executed for Louis XIV., his queen, Marie Thérèse, the great Condé, the brothers Du Puy, the Chancellor Pierre Segulier, Sir Kenelm Digby, and other collectors are preserved in the French National Library.

Although we are not able with absolute certainty to connect any binding with Le Gascon's name, a very remarkable one—that of the celebrated La Guirlande de Julie—has long been traditionally ascribed

PLATE V.

NOVUM TESTAMENTUM GRÆCE. AMSTERDAMI, 1633.

RED MOROCCO. BOUND BY LE GASCON.

Actual size.

for the end us bo accom
the fir wards
med ked dical
the con
The
teria ners along
N
liffe ade rant ing his we 16

Pa
hi in a

to him, for it is asserted by M. de Gaignères, who possessed the volume at the end of the seventeenth century, to have been his work. This famous book was presented to Julie Lucine d'Angennes, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of the Marquis and Marquise de Rambouillet, on the first day of the year 1641 by the Duke de Montausier, who afterwards became her husband. It is a folio manuscript on vellum, adorned with paintings of flowers by Nicolas Robert, an artist who worked for Gaston d'Orléans, each drawing being accompanied by a madrigal, exquisitely written by the celebrated Jarry. The madrigals were composed by nineteen poets, among them being the great Corneille.

The binding is of red morocco, with a doublure of the same material, both ornamented with a semis of a monogram composed of the letters J. L. (Julie Lucine). This marvel of calligraphy and binding belongs at the present time to the Duchesse d'Uzès.

No other binder has been so greatly imitated as Le Gascon : his influence extended to England, Italy, Germany, and Holland. Exact models of his tools were used, but the sure hand of the master was wanting, and copies of his bindings are always very inferior to the originals. Badier and Magnus of Amsterdam were by far the best of his imitators.

The date of the death of Le Gascon has not been discovered, nor do we know when Macé Ruetted died, but the latter was no longer living in 1644, for in that year his son, Antoine Ruetted, who was born in 1609, published an edition of L'Office de la Semaine Sainte, in which he styles himself Relieur ord. du Roy, showing that he had succeeded his father in this post, for which he received a salary of one hundred livres a year, and a residence for life in the Collège Royal.

The British Museum possesses a copy of a work entitled La Lyre du Jeune Apollon, ou la Muse Naissante du Petit de Beauchasteau, printed at Paris in 1657, the binding of which was probably executed by him. Green morocco is the material used for the outside of the covers, red morocco being employed for the doublure. The ornamentation is in the style of Le Gascon, and the sides bear the arms of Louis XIV., over which the cypher of George III. has been unfortunately impressed.

A worthy successor to De Thou was Nicolas Claude Fabri de Peiresc. Born in 1580, he early developed an intellect of singular power. His father, a man of learning himself, spared no expense in the education of his son, who quickly acquired a great reputation for his genius and knowledge. He collected a large number of choice books, which he had bound in morocco, stamped with his cypher, or initials, in gold. Bouchard, in his funeral oration on Pieresc, states that he took "care to get from all places the most excellent Books, and to adorn them with gold, purple, and all manner of neat and curious workmanship, by such excellent Workmen, as lived in his house;" and Pierre Gassend, in his Life of Peiresc, translated by Dr. Rand, informs us that "his care was exceeding great, to procure plenty and variety of Books. For to say nothing of Manuscripts, which if ancient, in case he could not procure them, he would cause copies to be written out (and sometimes wrote them out himself), having by him catalogues of the most renowned and chief Libraries in the world. To pass over, I say, Manuscripts, he bought up printed Books at Rome, Venice, Paris, Amsterdam, Antwerp, London, Lyons, and other places; and that not only after the Mart was over at Francfort, but all the year long, his friends acquainting him with, and sending such, as were for his turn; for which he caused money to be paid, either by the Bankers and Money-changers, or by friends. Also where ever any Libraries were to be sold by outcry, he took order to have the rarer Books bought up, especially such as were of some neat Edition, which he had not. And truly 'tis incredible to tell, how great a number of Books he gathered together; also, it is incredible how it should therefore come to passe, that he left not a most compleat Library behind him; but neither of these will seem strange, if a man shall consider, that he sought Books, not for himself alone, but for any that stood in need of them. He lent an innumerable company, which were never restored; also he gave a world away, as I hinted before, of which he could hardly hope ever to get the like again; which he did when learned men had occasion to use them. For as for such Books as were commonly to be had at the Book-sellers, of them he was wonderfully profuse and lavish. For which cause, as often as he was informed of Books newly come forth, he would have many of them, which he would partly keep by him, and partly distribute them immediately among his friends, according as he knew they would like the subject matter thereof."

"And whether he gave them away, or kept them, he would be sure to have them neatly bound and covered ; to which end, he kept an industrious Book-binder in his House, who did exquisitely bind and adorn them. Yea, and sometimes he kept many Book-binders at once ; for one man was hardly ever able to bind up such store of Books as came trowling in from all parts. Also, it happened frequently that such Books as he borrowed, being neglected by their owners and ill-bound, he delivered to his binder to be rectified and beautified, viz. when their subject matter or rarity deserved that cost ; so that having received them, ill-bound, and ill-favoured, he returned them trim and handsome. And so he did by all the very old Books which he could get, whether printed or Manuscripts. Nor did his care only extend to such as were entire and perfect ; but even to the fragments of Books and Leaves half eaten. And being demanded why he would be at that charge in the Book-binding, he would say, 'the Cause was, inasmuch as the best Books, when they fell into unlearned men's hands ill-accoutred, were pittifully used ; he therefore endeavoured, that they might be prized at least for the beauty of their binding, and so escape the danger of the Tobacconist and Grocer. And those which he bound for his own use, he would have his Mark stampd upon them. Which mark was made up of these three Capital Greek Letters, N K Φ, which were so neatly interwoven, that being doubted, they might be read to the right hand and to the left, by which initial capital Letters, these three words were designed, Nicolas, Klaudius, Phabricius."

This monogram is stamped in the centre of the covers, which, with the exception of a simple border-fillet, are generally unadorned, but sometimes we find beautiful fine work added at the corners and in the centre of an inner panel enclosing the cypher (see Fig. 17).

Peiresc died in 1637, deeply regretted by his friends. "Oh cruel Fate and bitter Death, thrust into the midst of our jollity !" wrote Gabriel Naudé, the celebrated librarian. "Was there ever a man, I pray you, more skilled in history and philology, more ready to assist the student, more endowed with wit and wealth and worth, the equipment of any man who, like Peiresc, is to hold the world of letters at his beck and call."

Most of the bindings executed for Louis XIV. are remarkable for sobriety of taste. The decoration is generally confined to a plain fillet

Fig. 17.—Commentatio Explicationum Omnium Tragicarum Sophoclis, etc., Lasilæ, 1556.

Red morocco ; with monogram of Peiresc. $7\frac{1}{2}$ in. by $4\frac{3}{4}$ in.

round the edges of the covers, to which is frequently added an inner framework of lines, with fleurs-de-lis at the corners, enclosing the arms of the king. There is a simple dignity about the volumes which is very effective and pleasing. An example is given in Fig. 18.

The bindings of his queen, Marie Thérèse of Austria, are for the most Fig. 18.—Les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugene. Paris, 1671.

Red morocco ; with arms of Louis XIV. 10 in. by 7½ in.

part in the same style, with her arms impressed in the centre of the covers, which are also occasionally ornamented with a semis of her monogram surmounted by a crown.

The history of the French binding of this time would hardly be complete without some notice of that eminent scholar and collector Sir Kenelm Digby. He was the author of several remarkable works, and Lord Clarendon describes him as a man of "very extraordinary person and presence, with a wonderful graceful behaviour and a flowing courtesy and civility." He possessed a very fine library, which, on the outbreak of the civil war in England, he took with him to France, and had many of the volumes bound there by Le Gascon and other celebrated binders. He had previously presented to the Bodleian Library a valuable collection of books, which Thomas Allen, his former tutor, had bequeathed to him as a token of his regard. Besides this donation to the Bodleian Library, Digby gave a considerable number of volumes to the library of Harvard College, Cambridge, Massachusetts. When he died, his library, which was still abroad, was claimed as the property of the French king, by virtue of the droit d'aubaine, and it is said to have been purchased for 10,000 crowns by the Earl of Bristol, who died in 1676, and whose books were sold in London in 1680. A priced catalogue of the sale is in the British Museum, and it is stated in it that the books principally belonged "to the library of the Right Honourable George, late Earl of Bristol, a great part of which were the curiosities collected by the learned Sir Kenelm Digby." Many of the volumes, however, which belonged to Digby remained in France, and are to be found in the libraries of that country, especially the Bibliothèque Nationale. One with a most beautiful binding by Le Gascon is preserved in the Bibliothèque Mazarine.

The little volume from his library shown in Fig. 19 was also probably bound by Le Gascon, as the tools used in producing the ornamental corner-pieces which decorate the sides resemble those employed by him, and they are worked au pointillé. The covers bear the arms of Sir Kenelm, impaling those of his wife Venetia, daughter of Sir Edward Stanley, and a monogram composed of the letters K. V. D. occurs on two of the panels of the back. Red morocco is the material used for the binding. The book is an autograph copy of a treatise, dated Paris, January 13, 1636, by Sir Kenelm Digby, "concerning what faith and religion is the true one to bring us to eternall happinesse," and was addressed to the Lady Frances Villiers, Viscountess Purbeck, for the purpose of inducing her to join the Church of Rome. It was afterwards published at Paris in 1638 under the title of A Conference with a Lady concerning Religion. It forms No. 2312 of the collection of Harleian MSS. in the British Museum.

Fig. 19.—What faith is the true one, &c., MS.
Red morocco ; with arms of Sir Kenelm Digby and Venetia his wife. $6\frac{1}{2}$ in. by $4\frac{1}{2}$ in.

Another great collector of this period was Cardinal Mazarin, who with the assistance of his librarian Naudé formed a library of 45,000 volumes—among them being the famous Loménie collection of manuscripts—which he threw open to the public. The readers were supplied with chairs and writing materials, and the attendants were directed to fetch all books asked for in any language or department of learning, and also to change them as often as required. In 1651, however, during the troubles of the Fronde, the Parliament got the upper hand of the

Fig. 20.—Arms of Cardinal Mazarin.

“rouge tyran,” and Mazarin’s books, together with his other possessions, were confiscated and sold. On his return to power in 1653, the reconstruction of his library was one of his first thoughts, and by the year 1660 the new library had acquired all the splendour which distinguished the first. Mazarin’s books are all handsomely bound—many of them by Le Gascon—in red morocco, with his arms (see Fig. 20), usually surmounted by a cardinal’s hat, in the centre of the covers, and a monogram consisting of the letters C. J. M. (Cardinal Jules Mazarin) or J. M. (Jules Mazarin) stamped at the corners. The arms are sometimes surrounded by one or the other of the pompous and pretentious mottoes—ARMA JULII ORNANT FRANCIAM ; SUOQUE CONSILIO GALLIAM GUBERNAT.

Nicolas Fouquet, the celebrated Superintendent of the Finances of France, who died in 1680, also possessed a fine library, but falling into disgrace he was imprisoned in the fortress of Pignerol, and his books were sold ; thirteen thousand of them being purchased for the collection of the king.

CHAPTER IV

Claude Le Mire—Boyot—Jansenist Bindings—Colbert—Longepierre—Elizabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans—Madame de Maintenon—Du Seuil—Pierre Anguerrand—Von Hoym—Countess de Verrue.

CLAUDE LE MIRE appears to have succeeded Antoine Ruette as royal binder, and to have held the office conjointly with Gilles Dubois, until his death in 1698, when the appointment was bestowed upon Luc Antoine Boyet, who kept it for thirty-five years. In addition to the bindings done by him for Louis XIV., Boyet is believed to have worked for Colbert, Fléchier, Bishop of Nismes, Phélypeaux, Madame de Chamillart, Longepierre, and Count von Hoym. The bindings attributed to him are very plainly tooled, the ornamentation generally consisting only of a rectangular fillet of gold lines, with some slight decoration at the angles, but they are distinguished by their solidity and the finish and excellence of the forwarding.¹ They occasionally possess fine doublures. Boyet is also believed to have executed many of the bindings which, on account of the austerity of their style, were named after the ascetic sect of the Jansenists. These Jansenist bindings are without any gilding on the outside of the covers, but the inside is frequently richly tooled.

Jean Baptiste Colbert, Marquis de Seignelay, Minister and Secretary of State, and Controller-General of the Finances of France, one of the great collectors for whom Boyet bound, was born at Rheims on the 29th of August 1619. His administrative ability early attracted the notice of Cardinal Mazarin, who confided to him the management of his affairs, and in 1661, when on his deathbed, appointed him one of the executors of his will. He also recommended him to the king as a man of well-proved fidelity and great capacity for business. "Sire," the cardinal is reputed to have said, some days before he died, to Louis XIV., "I owe everything I possess to your Majesty, but I believe I pay a portion of my debt in leaving you Colbert."

¹ The processes through which a book passes after it is sewed, and before it is placed in the hands of the finisher to be tooled

The benefits conferred upon France by Colbert were very great. He restored the finances of the State to a flourishing condition, promoted in every way manufactures and commerce, and was a generous patron of literature, science, and art. He increased the royal library from 16,000 to 40,000 volumes, and gave every encouragement to men of genius, dispensing a considerable sum every year in pensions to persons who deserved them on account of their learning or their works. The names of Molière, Racine, Pierre Corneille and his brother, Perrault, Huet, Chapelain, and the historian Mézerai are found in his list of pensioners; and his bounty was even extended to several distinguished foreigners—Huyghens, the Dutch mathematician, and Vossius, the geographer, being among the number.

Colbert was as celebrated for his books as for his talents as a statesman. His library contained 8,000 very rare and valuable manuscripts, among them being a Book of Hours believed to have been used by Charlemagne, and a Bible illuminated for Charles the Bald. The number of printed books was also very considerable, amounting to between 50,000 and 60,000 volumes, almost all of them handsomely bound in beautiful levant morocco, a supply of which leather had been obtained for the Minister by an article in a treaty with the Sultan. Colbert's arms (or, a snake torqued in pale, azure), encircled with the collars of the orders of St. Michel and the St. Esprit, are always impressed on the sides, while his initials, interlaced and surmounted by a coronet, generally occur on the panels of the back, and sometimes also at the corners of the covers (see Fig. 21). Colbert died in 1683, and the library remained in his family for forty-five years afterwards. In 1728, however, his grandson, Charles Eléonor Colbert, Count de Seignelay, disposed of the printed books by auction, and some time after sold six hundred of the manuscripts to the collector Meigret de Serilly, for 12,000 livres. These proceedings greatly alarmed the literary world, and it was so generally felt that the dispersion of these precious manuscripts would be a public loss that they were purchased by Louis XV. for the royal library for the sum of 300,000 livres.

The books of Hilaire Bernard de Requeleyne, Baron de Longepierre, for whom Boyet also worked, have a special interest, on account of their bindings. Born in 1659, Longepierre at a very early age displayed such great ability that Adrien Baillet included him among the celebrated children mentioned in his work Des Enfants devenus célèbres par leurs Études ou par leurs Écrits, which was printed at Paris in the year 1688. When still very young he translated the works of Anacreon, Bion and Moschus, Sappho, and Theocritus ; and in 1690 he published his Recueil d'Idylles, which, however, met with a less favourable reception than his translations. From these works he turned his attention to the drama, and produced successively Médée, which was first printed at Paris in 1694, Sesostris, and Electra. Médée proved a very great success, but the others were less fortunate, and failed to obtain the approbation of the public. "Longepierre," said Voltaire, "not only follows the example of the Greek poets in their tragedies in not introducing any love into their stern and tragic subjects, but he also imitates them in the tediousness of their more commonplace scenes, and in their want of plot and action, while he does not equal them in the beauty of their elocution, which constitutes their great merit."

Fig. 21.—Caii Suetonii Tranquilli Opera. Parisiis, 1644.
Red morocco ; with arms of Colbert. 5½ in. by 3 in.

Longepierre commemorated the success of Médée by decorating the bindings of all his books with the Golden Fleece. This ornament, which forms their only embellishment, is most commonly impressed in the centre and at the corners of the sides, and on the panels of the backs; and when the bindings have doublures they are also decorated with it. Du Seuil and Padeloup, as well as Boyet, are reckoned among the number of his binders.

Although the works of Longepierre are now well-nigh forgotten, the bindings of his books are held in great estimation by collectors, and command very high prices. A copy of Les Idylles de Bion et de Moschus, translated by Longepierre and printed at Paris in 1686, in a red morocco binding with a green doublure by Boyet, was sold at the Didot sale in 1878 for the large sum of 10,900 francs.

Fig. 22 represents a pretty little volume, which once belonged to him, containing the works of Claudian, printed by Elzevir at Leyden in 1650, now preserved in the library of the British Museum, where a considerable number of his books are to be found. It is bound in red morocco, with the Golden Fleece in the centre and at the corners of the sides and on the panels of the back. The green morocco with which the covers are lined is also ornamented with it.

Longepierre died in Paris on the 31st of March 1721.

Elizabeth Charlotte, called the Princess Palatine, second wife of Philip Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV., possessed some fine books, elegantly bound. Among them were three beautiful Bibles, of which she writes in the following terms: "I have three handsome Bibles—that of Mérian, which my aunt, the Abbess of Maubuisson, left me; a Luneburg edition, which is very fine; and a third, which the Princess of Oldenburg, daughter of the Princess of Taranto, sent me.

This last is like my person, small and stout, and neither the letterpress nor the illustrations are as good as those of the others." The volumes from her library are bound in morocco, and bear her arms in the centre of the covers and her crowned monogram at the corners.

Fig. 22.—Claudiani Opera. Lugd. Batav. 1650.
Red morocco. Bound for Baron de Longepierre. 5½ in. by 3¼ in.

The library of the Princess's great enemy, Madame de Maintenon, also was rich in choice and handsomely bound volumes, upon which her arms are generally impressed (see Fig. 23).

Augustin Du Seuil, who worked for the Duke and Duchess de Berry, Count von Hoym, and many other distinguished amateurs of his time, was a craftsman of great repute. Unfortunately no authenticated binding by him is known, so we can only conjecture what his style was like. That which is commonly associated with his name—a fillet of gold lines, enclosing an inner frame with a small floral ornament at the angles—was in very general use long before his birth, which took place in the year 1673.

Another curious mistake has arisen in connection with Du Seuil. In 1724 the libraries of Henri de Loménie, Count de Brienne, Secretary of State to Louis XIV., and the Marquis de La Bazonnière were sold in London at the shop of James Woodman and David Lyon, in Russell Street, Covent Garden, and the catalogues state that many of the volumes “were bound in morocco by the famous Abbé du Seuil.” Although considerable research has been made, no abbé of this name who worked as a binder has been discovered, and there is little or no doubt but that Augustin Du Seuil was the person who bound the books. How the mistake occurred it is difficult to say, but it was generally adopted in a very extraordinary way in France as well as in this country, and it was long believed that these books had been bound by the abbé for his amusement; even Charles Nodier, the eminent collector, considered that he was “un ecclésiastique du diocèse de Paris, qui exerçait la reliure en amateur.” The sale of these fine libraries caused the name of Du Seuil to be well known in England, and he is mentioned by Pope in the fourth of the Moral Epistles, which was printed in 1731 under the title of False Taste.

His study! with what authors is it stored?
In books, not authors, curious is my Lord;
To all their dated backs he turns you round;
These Aldus printed, those Du Sueil has bound.

In 1717, at the instance of the Duchess de Berry, Louis XV. appointed Du Seuil to be one of his binders in ordinary, although there was no vacancy at the time. The patent reads:—

“Aujourd’hui 26 février 1717, le Roy estant à Paris, ayant esgard aux témoignages avantageux qui lui ont esté rendus de la probité et capacité d’Augustin de Sueil, maistre relieur à Paris, et voulant en cette considération le traiter favorablement, Sa Majesté, de l’avis de M. le Duc d’Orléans, son oncle Régent, a retenu et retient le dit de Sueil en la charge de l'un de ses relieurs ordinaires pour par luy en faire les fonctions, en jouir et user aux mesmes honneurs, prérogatives et privilèges dont jouissent les autres relieurs de Sa Majesté, avec le pouvoir de mettre au devant de sa boutique un tapis chargé des armes et panonceaux de Sa Majesté. Et pour assurance de Sa volonté, Elle ma commandé d'expédier au dit de Sueil le présent brevet qu'Elle a signé de sa main, et fait contresigner par moy conseiller, secrétaire d'Estat," etc.

Fig. 23.—Arms of Madame de Maintenon.

On the death of Louis Joseph Dubois, his post was bestowed upon Du Seuil by a new brevet :—

“Aujourd’hui 15 février 1728, le Roy estant à Versailles, bien informé de la capacité d’Augustin de Seuil, et de sa fidélité et affection à son service, Sa Majesté l’a retenu et retient en la charge de l’un des relieurs de sa maison, vacante par le décès de Louis du Bois, dernier possesseur d’icelle ; pour le dit de Sueil l’avoir et exercer, en jouir et user, aux honneurs, autorités, privilèges, franchises, libertés, gages, droits, fruits, profits, revenus et esmolumens accoutumés et y appartenants tels et semblables qu'en a jouy ou dû jouir le dit du Bois, et tant qu'il plaira à Sa Majesté," etc. Du Seuil died in February 1746, and was succeeded by Pierre Anguerrand, who worked for several of the great collectors of the time, as binder in ordinary to the king.

During the latter part of the seventeenth century, and the greater portion of the eighteenth, the number of collectors in France was so large that it is impossible to give an account of more than a few of the most distinguished of them. In Guigard's excellent work, Le Nouvel Armorial du Bibliophile, printed at Paris in 1890, will be found short biographical notices of almost all who are known, accompanied with illustrations of the arms which they placed upon the bindings of their books. Of these collectors Count Karl Heinrich von Hoym was one of the most eminent. He was born at Dresden in 1694, and entered the service of his king, Augustus II., at an early age. In 1720, although not twenty-six years old, he was appointed minister and afterwards ambassador of Saxony and Poland in France. During the period he filled this post he mixed with the best and most distinguished society of the day, and formed those grand collections of paintings, china, bronzes, and especially of books which have made his name so well known to lovers of art and letters. Following the example of the Cardinal de Rohan, the Countess de Verrue, the Abbé de Rothelin, and other celebrated collectors of the time, whose acquaintance he had made while in Paris, he formed a library which was remarkable both for the number and value of the books and the beauty of the bindings. Many of the volumes had belonged to famous libraries, and among them were five which had formerly been in the possession of Grolier. Boyet, Du Seuil, and Padeloup were his binders.

In 1729 Von Hoym was recalled to Saxony and appointed a Cabinet Minister, but he had not long held his new office before he fell into disgrace, being accused of revealing the secrets of the manufacture of china at Dresden to the factory at Sèvres, and was finally imprisoned in the fortress of Königstein, where on the 21st of April 1736 he committed suicide by hanging himself with a handkerchief fastened to a hook in the wall of his sleeping chamber. The following note addressed to two of his servants, which was found after his death, shows with how much deliberation the deed was executed: "Be prudent, make no noise or alarm; untie me immediately; put me to bed, and then shut the door after you by bolting it inside when you are out, which you will be able to do with the aid of string ; by this means nobody will know you have been in my chamber, and it will doubtless be believed that I died of apoplexy. If you

Fig. 24.—T. Lucretii Cari de Rerum Natura Libri VI. Lutetiae, 1570.
Brown calf ; with arms of Count von Hoym. $9\frac{1}{2}$ in. by $6\frac{1}{2}$ in.

execute my orders discreetly and faithfully, my family will pay you 1,000 ducats upon the production of this note to them."

The volume from Von Hoym's library of which Fig. 24 is a representation is a copy of De Rerum Natura, by Lucretius, printed at Paris in 1570. It is bound in brown calf, and has the arms of Von Hoym impressed in the centre of each cover; the White Eagle of Poland, of which order he was a knight, occurring on the panels of the back. Padeloup was the binder, and his ticket, which reads Relié par Padeloup le jeune, place Sorbonne à Paris, is affixed to the title-page. The volume was bequeathed to the British Museum by the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville.

Count von Hoym's books were sold after his death, together with his collections of paintings, bronzes, and other works of art. The library realised 85,000 livres, less by 30,000 livres than it cost.

Jeanne Baptiste d'Albret de Luynes, Countess de Verrue, who was born in 1670, also deserves special notice on account of her splendid collection of books and paintings. She was the daughter of the Duke de Luynes and Anne de Rohan, his second wife, and was married at a very early age to the Count de Verrue, a Piedmontese officer. Two years after their marriage the young couple paid a visit to Turin, and the Countess was presented to Victor Amadeus II., Duke of Savoy and first King of Sardinia, who fell deeply in love with her, and eventually, but not without great difficulty, persuaded her to become his mistress. She soon practically ruled both the Court and the State. Saint-Simon says of her "that she established her empire over the whole Court of Savoy; the sovereign was at her feet with such respect as would be shown to a goddess. She had a share in the granting of indulgences, and dispensed all favours."

After some time, however, becoming greatly dissatisfied with her life in Savoy, she determined to quit the country. Carefully concealing her intentions, she had her collections secretly conveyed to France, and then, with the aid of her brother, the Chevalier de Luynes, fled from Turin. Availing herself of the absence of the Duke, she dressed herself in male attire and rode on horseback to Susa, crossed Mont Cenis in a litter, and then took a carriage to Dampierre, one of the seats of the De Luynes family. Soon after her arrival in France she retired to a convent, where she remained as long as her husband lived, but after his death, at the battle of Blenheim in 1704, she caused a magnificent mansion to be constructed for her in Paris, now the Hôtel des Conseils de Guerre.

which soon became the favourite rendezvous of all the beaux esprits of the time. Here she lived in great luxury, and formed a gallery of no less than four hundred paintings by Rubens, Vandyke, Claude Lorraine, and other great artists. The collections of gems, china, and engravings were also very extensive and choice. Her library, which was a particularly fine one, was very rich in romances, memoirs, and theatrical pieces. The books are generally somewhat plainly bound in morocco or calf, with the arms of the Countess impressed on the sides; on some of them is also stamped the word MEUDON, the name of a country residence where she possessed a second collection (see Fig. 25).

Fig. 25.—Arms of Countess de Verrue.

Devoted to art and letters, the Countess de Verrue passed the remainder of her days in tranquillity among her much-loved treasures, and died on the 18th of November 1736, leaving the following lines to serve as her epitaph:—

Ci-git, dans une paix profonde,
Cette dame de volupté,
Qui, pour plus grande sûreté,
Fit son paradis dans ce monde.

CHAPTER V

Padeloup—Derome—Bradel—Lemonnier—Tessier—Louis XV.—Mesdames de France—Fournier—Madame de Pompadour—Douceur—Madame du Barry—Bisiaux—Louis XVI.—Marie Antoinette—Ract—Dubuisson—Laferté—Vente—Jubert—The brothers Bozérian—Thouvenin—Purgold—Simier—Capé—Bauzonnet—Trautz—Cuzin—Niedricé—Duru—Thibaron—Joly—Hardy—Mesnil—Lortic—Chambolle.

ANTOINE MICHEL PADELOUP, commonly called Padeloup le jeune, to distinguish him from his brothers, was the most celebrated member of a family which during five generations produced a large number of binders and stationers. The earliest of whom we have any record is Antoine Padeloup, who was apprenticed to Nicolas Guérard in 1623, and obtained his warrant as master binder in 1633. He married Françoise Cusson, sister of Jean Cusson, who according to La Caille was "the most able binder of his time." François Padeloup, the last binder of the family, was still alive towards the end of the eighteenth century.

Antoine Michel Padeloup, who belonged to the third generation, was born on the 22nd of December 1685. He served his apprenticeship with his father, Michel Padeloup; and on the decease of Luc Antoine Boyet succeeded him as "Relieur du Roy," having as his colleague Augustin Du Seuil, who had married Padeloup's cousin Françoise. He died on the 7th of September 1758. He was twice married, and left a numerous family by each of his wives.

Padeloup worked for all the chief collectors of his time, among them being Count von Hoym and Madame de Pompadour. His bindings are famed for the beauty of the leather, and the excellence of the forwarding, as well as the graceful tooling with which the more important of them are embellished. By the aid of the étiquette, or ticket, which he generally placed in the books which he bound we are fortunately able to recognise

PLATE VI.

OFFICE DE LA SEMAINE SAINTE. PARIS, 1712.

MOSAIC BINDING. BOUND BY PADELOUP.

WITH ARMS OF THE HOUSE OF ORLEANS ON DOUBLURE.
'size.

many of them with certainty, but as either he did not always adopt this practice, or the tickets have in some cases been removed from the volumes, a certain amount of doubt still exists with respect to a few of the productions ascribed to him. On one of his tickets, affixed to the Carte générale de la Monarchie Française, printed in 1733, he styles himself "Relieur ordinaire du Roy de Portugal," but this title he appears to have presented in 1741 to his son Jean, and his tickets generally read, "Relié par Padeloup le jeune, place Sorbonne à Paris." Padeloup used many different styles of ornamentation for his bindings, some of them being remarkable for their simplicity, while others are of a very elaborate character, but his principal decoration consists of beautiful dentelle or lace borders of extreme richness and elegance. Many of his bindings have also very graceful doublures. Padeloup produced, too, a number of mosaic or inlaid bindings, the execution of which is almost always perfect ; but, while the eye rests with a great amount of pleasure upon these really charming volumes, it must be confessed that the repetition of the tile-like pattern with which many of them are decked has a somewhat feeble and monotonous effect. Plate VI. represents a fine example of one of these mosaic bindings, which was probably executed by him, although it may possibly have been bound by his cousin, Nicolas Padeloup the younger, who was binder to the Duke of Orleans, and is known to have done some work of this description. The book which it encloses is a copy of the Office de la Semaine Sainte, printed at Paris in 1712, and bound for Françoise Marie de Bourbon, called Mademoiselle de Blois, daughter of Louis XIV. and Madame de Montespan. Born in 1677, she was legitimised in 1681, and married in 1692 to Philippe, Duke of Orleans, who afterwards became Regent of France. The exterior of the volume is covered with brown morocco, inlaid with olive and red ; the insides of the covers being lined with red morocco, tooled with a handsome gilt border, which encloses the arms of the duchess. The fly-leaf is of gilt paper, a fashion of the time. The book, which measures 8 inches by 5 inches, was bequeathed to the British Museum by Felix Slade, Esq. The most famous of these bindings is that of the Regent Orleans's copy of Les Amours Pastorales de Daphnis et de Cloë, a marvel of red, blue, and citron morocco, elaborately tooled in gold, and bearing on each cover the arms of the duke. This triumph of the binder's art—at least as far as the workmanship is concerned—an octavo volume, was sold a few years ago for the enormous sum of 17,500 francs.

The number of binders bearing the name of Derome is even greater than that of Padeloup. Thoinan, in his excellent and exhaustive work Les Relieurs Français, gives a list of eighteen who belonged to the first-named family, and of fifteen who were members of the second. Claude and André Derome, who became master binders respectively in the years 1663 and 1660, were sons of a Pierre Derome, whose occupation is unknown, but who was probably a binder. In the branch of the family descending from Claude we find eleven members of the profession. It terminated with Pierre Michel Derome, who was received as a master in 1777. In that descending from André there were five, the last of them being Nicolas Denis Derome, called le jeune, the most celebrated of them all, and to whom we almost invariably allude when we speak of a binding by Derome. His father, Jacques Antoine Derome, was also a binder who did some excellent work, and was greatly esteemed in his day, but his reputation is obscured by that of his more famous son.

The designs used by Derome on his bindings are extremely graceful, and rival those of Padeloup, to which they bear a strong resemblance. If it be true that he purchased the material and stamps of this binder at the sale of his effects after his death, it explains to some extent the great similarity of the ornamentation employed by the two artists. Derome executed many mosaic bindings, but his great renown has been gained by his dentelles, especially those in which he introduced a little bird with outstretched wings, and which are in consequence termed dentelles à l'oiseau. The first conception of these beautiful patterns is probably due to the art iron-work of the eighteenth century, which may still be seen in the balconies and staircases of the period.

MM. Marius Michel, in La Reliure Française, say that Derome sought and found in the industries of his time the elements of a new decoration, and his efforts were crowned with success with the dentelles to which he has given his name, and which are distinguished from preceding ones by not being made up of the same tools in repetition, but in combination, thus affording much more variety.

PLATE VII.

LES GRANS CRONIKES DE FRANCE.

ANTHOINE VERARD, PARIS, 1493.

RED MOROCCO. BOUND BY DEROME.

15½ in. by 11 in.

The various étiquettes, or tickets, of Derome read :—

No. 1. Relié par Derome le jeune, rue St. Jâque audessus de S. Benoist.

No. 2. Relié par Derome le jeune, rue St. Jâque audessus de St. Benoist (a larger ticket than No. 1).

No. 3. Relié par Derome dit le jeune, établie en 1760, ruë St Jacques, près le collège de plessis, No. 65.

No. 4. Relié par Derome le jeune demeure presentment rue St. Jacques, près le College du Plessis, Hôtel de la Couture No. 65 en 1785.

The ticket of another Derome—Nicolas, the second son of Jacques Antoine Derome—is occasionally found in books bound by him. It reads : Relié par De Rome, rue des Chiens, près Ste. Geneviève, Paris. His bindings are good, but somewhat heavy in appearance.

Derome has been repeatedly accused of mercilessly cropping the margins of the volumes entrusted to him in order to obtain evenness of the edges, forgetting that the binding is made for the book and not the book for the binding ; but, although the charge is not altogether without foundation, his offence has been greatly exaggerated. Derome was born on October 1, 1731, became a master binder on March 31, 1761, and was elected one of the Gardes en Charge of the Community of the Master Binders and Gilders of the City and University of Paris on May 10, 1773, at the same time as François Gaudreau, binder to the dauphine. He died about the year 1788, and was succeeded in his business by his nephew, Alexis Pierre Bradel, who, however, failed to maintain the reputation of the house at the height to which his uncle had raised it. The style of Derome is well shown by the binding reproduced in Plate VII. The material is red morocco, the sides being ornamented with a very graceful and elaborate dentelle border. The insides of the covers and the end papers are lined with blue watered silk, and the volume—a copy of Les Grans Croniques de France, printed by Antoine Verard at Paris in 1493—contains the ticket of the binder. It was purchased by the British Museum in 1848.

The family of Lemonnier, or Monnier—both forms of the name were indifferently used by those bearing it—furnished even a larger number of binders than those of Padeloup and Derome, for there were at least twenty members of it who followed the profession. The earliest known is Pierre Monnier, who was apprenticed to Pierre Vinay in 1623 ; and the latest, Philbert Charles Lemonnier, who is believed by Thoinan to have worked in Paris as late as 1810. The two of the greatest note were Louis François Lemonnier, who became a master binder in 1737, and Jean Charles Henri, his son, who was admitted as a master in 1757, and elected Garde in 1769. He was binder to the Duke of Orleans, and in a copy of the Poésies de Malherbe, which he bound for that prince, and which is now preserved in the library of Versailles, we find his ticket pasted inside the cover. It reads : "Le Monnier, seul Relieur-Doreur de Livres de Monseigneur le Duc d'Orléans, et de sa Maison. Demeure ruë et vis-à-vis le Collège de Beauvais, à Paris." This ticket, which has a handsome border enclosing the Orleans arms, was also used by Tessier, who succeeded Le Monnier as binder to the duke, the name and address alone being changed.

It is probable that both the father and the son had a share in the production of the famous mosaic bindings which bear the name of Monnier—unfortunately without any initial—for which collectors are willing to give such large sums : one was sold at the Beckford sale in 1882 for £356.

Although the execution of these bindings leaves but little to be desired, the designs are often fantastical, and not always in the best taste. The decoration of the little French bible figured in Plate VIII. is, however, quite free from these defects, and there are few examples of mosaic work in existence which can be compared with the binding of this charming volume. The material is red morocco, ornamented with flowers formed by inlaid leathers of various colours. The flowers are principally of a cream colour, and the leaves are olive ; the outlines and fibres being very delicately and skilfully tooled in gold. The workmanship is perfect, and the effect is altogether pleasing. The binding has the advantage of being in as good condition as when it left Monnier's hands, and time has greatly enhanced its beauty by mellowing the tone of the colours. The name of the binder is twice stamped on each cover.

The books which belonged to Louis XV. possess but little interest, and, with some exceptions, are bound in the plain style of the time, with his arms on the covers (Fig. 26) ; but his three daughters, the

PLATE VIII.

LA SAINTE BIBLE. COLOGNE, 1739.
MOSAIC BINDING. BOUND BY MONNIER.
Actual size.

Mesdames de France, Adélaïde, Sophie, and Victoire, each formed a choice collection of books, prettily bound in morocco, partly by Derome and partly by Fournier, a binder, bookseller, and stationer to the Court, who occupied apartments in the palace of Versailles. His ticket reads: "A la Chercheuse d'Esprit, Rue Satory, vis-à-vis la rue de Versailles; et au Château à côté de Monseigneur le Duc de Luynes, à Versailles. Fournier, Libraire, Relieur du Roi et de la Reine, et Marchand Papetier suivant la Cour; Vend, achete et relie toutes sortes de Livres, Vend Papier, Plumes, Encre, Registres et généralement tout ce qui concerne la Papeterie.

'A Fontainebleau, au château, Galerie de Diane. Au château à Compiègne, à côté de la Sacristie. Au château à Marly, à côté de la chapelle.'"

He had also another ticket, in which he styled himself "Relieur de la Famille Royale et Papetier des Bureaux du Roi."

The volumes from the different libraries of these princesses are distinguished by the colour of the leather; those of Madame Adélaïde being clothed in red morocco, and those of Madame Sophie and Madame Victoire respectively in citron and olive. Their arms—the arms of France—on a lozenge-shaped shield, surmounted by a royal coronet (Fig. 27), are always impressed in the centre of the covers. The most important of these libraries was that of Madame Adélaïde, of which a manuscript catalogue was made in 1786, now preserved in the library of the Arsenal in Paris. At the Revolution the books of the three princesses were confiscated, and a large number of them passed into the library of Versailles. Many are also to be found in the Bibliothèque

Fig. 26.—Arms of Louis XV.

Nationale, and among them is a volume which belonged to Madame Victoire, on the fly-leaf of which occurs this simple note, written by the Commissioner of the Convention, "Victoire Capet No. 1996." The library of the British Museum also possesses several examples.

Jeanne Antoinette Poisson, Marquise de Pompadour, who for nineteen years was the virtual ruler of France, was not possessed of many virtues ; but she loved books, and her library, which consisted of upwards of 3,000 volumes, as well as an extensive collection of engravings, was a fine one. As might be expected, it abounded in light works, principally romances,

Fig. 27.—Arms of Mesdames de France.

part of its contents, and all branches of science and the arts were represented in it. Madame de Pompadour could boast of many elegant accomplishments. She played the lute and harpsichord with great skill, but it was in the arts of painting, drawing, and engraving that she particularly distinguished herself ; and Voltaire has sung her talents in the following pretty lines :—

Pompadour, ton crayon divin
Devait dessiner ton visage,
Jamais une plus belle main
N'eût fait un plus bel ouvrage.

She decorated some of the finest pieces of Sèvres porcelain with her paintings, and many excellent engravings by her are preserved in the French National Library, several of them from her own designs.

She was also taught the art of engraving gems by Jacques Guay, and numerous examples of her work on onyx, jasper, and other precious stones show the remarkable proficiency to which she had attained.

After the death of Madame de Pompadour, which took place on the 14th of April 1764, her books were sold, and a catalogue of them was published in 1765 by J. Hérissant, the king's printer. A copy in the library of the British Museum contains the prices in MS. which the books fetched at the sale. These prices are curiously low compared with the sums paid for the same books in recent times, as the following examples show :—

Longus. Amours de Daphnis et Chloë, printed at Paris in 1757, 4°; bound in red morocco. Sold at the Laroche La Carelle sale for 7,000 frs. ; 24 livres in 1765.

Le Sage. Le Diable Boiteux. Paris, 1756. 12°. 3 vols. in blue morocco. Realised 4,900 frs. at the Béhague sale in 1880 ; 24 livres in 1765.

Bellin. Description géographique de la Guiane. Paris, 1763. 4°. Red morocco. 1,800 frs. at the Béhague sale ; 24 livres in 1765.

Rabelais. Vie inestimable de Gargantua. Lyon, 1537. 16°. Citron morocco. Fetched 1,200 frs. at the Didot sale in 1878 ; 3 livres in 1765.

The books of Madame de Pompadour are always well, but generally somewhat plainly, bound, with a floral border, or one of lines only, on the sides. They always bear her arms—three castles argent on an azure field—in the centre of the covers. Padeloup, Derome, and Louis Douceur all worked for her. The pretty little volume from her library shown in Fig. 28 is a copy of Boccaccio's Ameto, printed at Florence in 1529. It is bound in red morocco, with a graceful floral border, enclosing the arms of the marchioness on the sides, and some very effective tooling on the back. Douceur was probably its binder. In 1765 it fetched but four livres ; at the present time it would probably realise £50. It was bequeathed to the British Museum by the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville.

At this period every woman of fashion had a library, and even Madame du Barry, who read and wrote with difficulty, considered that one was indispensable to a person of her rank. Her books are bound in red morocco, and bear her arms, with her motto, Boutez en avant, upon the sides. Bisiaux was her binder, and charged her ten livres for 4tos, four livres ten sols for 8vos and three livres for 12mos. All her possessions were confiscated in 1793, and the greater part of her books were placed in the library of Versailles, but a few are to be found in private collections.

The volumes which belonged to Louis XVI. are usually bound in red morocco, with but slight ornamentation. Before he became king they bear his arms as dauphin, but after he ascended the throne the usual shield of the kings of France was impressed on the covers. His queen, the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, patronised letters, and had a sincere regard for books. She formed two libraries—one at the

Fig. 28.—Ameto del Boccaccio. Firenze, 1529.

Red morocco ; with arms of Madame de Pompadour. $5\frac{3}{4}$ in. by $3\frac{3}{4}$ in.

Tuileries, and the other at the Petit Trianon. The collection at the Tuileries consisted of 1,371 works in 4,712 volumes. These books were confiscated by a decree of the Convention, and in 1793 were placed in the Bibliothèque Nationale, where they still remain. A few of them, however, passed into the cabinets of private collectors.

Millin, in the Magasin Encyclopédique, gives the following account of the library and its sequestration. "The different collections of books," he writes, "which existed in the palace of the Tuileries were removed to the Bibliothèque Nationale. The most considerable was that of the queen; it consisted principally of a large number of works of French, English, and Italian literature. The volumes were bound in morocco, and bore the arms of the queen, with the exception of the English books, which had English bindings. The collection contained a very beautiful series of the maps of France, arranged by provinces, and also many fine copies of scientific works, which had been presented by their authors, or were subscribed for by the Court. It also possessed a large collection of plays, a number of operas by the great Italian composers, and a complete set of the works of Gluck. What is somewhat surprising is the fact that there were so few books in German, the native language of the queen." Millin adds "that the king, whose library at the Tuileries was of little importance, his books being principally kept at Versailles, in pursuance of his studies frequently had recourse to the library of the queen."

The books in the library at the Petit Trianon consisted principally of romances and tales, not always of the best description. When they were confiscated, some of them were given to provincial libraries, but the greater part passed into the public library of Versailles. As we have already said, a few of the queen's books were acquired by private individuals, and among them a devotional work entitled Office de la Divine Providence, printed at Paris in 1757, which she used during her imprisonment in the Temple and Conciergerie, and on the last leaf of which, a few hours before her death, she wrote the following affecting words:—

"Ce 16 Octobre à 4h $\frac{1}{2}$ du matin. Mon Dieu! ayez pitié de moi! mes yeux n'ont plus de larmes pour prier pour vous, mes pauvres enfants. Adieu. Adieu.

"MARIE ANTOINETTE."

This little volume, to which so sad an interest is attached, is bound in green morocco, now much faded, and its covers once bore the arms of the queen, but these have been entirely effaced. It is now the property of Madame Garinet, of Châlons-sur-Marne.

The bindings executed for Marie Antoinette while dauphiness are much superior to those done for her in later years, and some of them are fine examples of perfect workmanship and excellent taste. The volumes which belonged to the library of the queen in the Tuileries are said by Brunet to have been bound by a binder named Blaizot. They are usually covered with red morocco, and have her arms impressed on the covers. Those which formed the library at the Petit Trianon are generally bound in full or half-calf. In addition to the arms, they bear on the back or sides the initials C.T. (Château de Trianon) surmounted by a crown. Those in full calf were bound by Fournier, and those in half binding by Ract, a binder and stationer.

A representation (Fig. 29) is given of a little book which once belonged to the queen, but is now preserved in the library of the British Museum. It is entitled Omaggio Poetico di Antonio di Gennaro, Duca di Belforte, alla Maestrà di Maria Giuseppa, Arciduchessa d'Austria e Regina di Napoli, and was printed at Paris in 1768. It is bound in red morocco, and has the arms of Marie Antoinette as dauphiness stamped in the centre of the covers.

Michel Antoine Padeloup was succeeded as binder in ordinary to the king by Pierre Paul Dubuisson, who was a gilder rather than a binder, as the work performed by him was principally confined to tooling the books which were bound under his direction. Some of his tickets read, "Doré par Dubuisson, rue St. Jacques." The decoration of the volumes which issued from his workshops is distinguished by much taste and great delicacy of execution. Dubuisson possessed a very considerable knowledge of heraldry, and formed a library very rich in documents relating to that subject. In 1757, in conjunction with Gastelier de La Tour, he published a work in two volumes in 12mo, entitled, Armorial des principales maisons et familles du royaume, et particulièrement de celles de Paris et de l'Ile de France, etc. Ouvrage enrichi de près de quatre mille écussons gravés en taille-douce. He died in 1762, and was, in turn, succeeded as binder to the king by Pierre Antoine Laferté, who was considered one of the best craftsmen of his day, and is believed by M. Thoinan to have worked for Madame de Pompadour. He died in 1769. There were several other members of his family who bore the reputation of being good binders. Pierre Vente and Jean Pierre Jubert, Fig. 29.—Omaggio Poetico di Antonio di Gennaro, Duca di Belforte. Parigi, 1768.

Red morocco ; with arms of Marie Antoinette as Dauphiness. 7 in. by $4\frac{1}{2}$ in.

who both died about the end of the century, may perhaps also be ranked among the more noted binders of the time.

During the troubles and excesses of the Revolution the race of great collectors in France disappeared ; their libraries were confiscated or dispersed, and under the rule of the Convention the art of fine binding became nearly extinct. The few bindings which were produced during this period are decorated with a figure of Liberty or some other revolutionary or patriotic emblem. With the establishment of the Empire a certain amount of revival took place, and the brothers Bozérien won for themselves a very considerable reputation as binders, but it has not survived to the present day. Their work is not wanting in talent, but it is not characterised by much taste. Thouvenin was really the first artist who restored the art of binding in France to something like its old excellence. Nodier speaks of him in terms of high praise.

“ Il n'est pas ici question du temps où, emporté par le goût des innovations à la mode, il raffina sur les dentelles baroques de la reliure impériale, ou inventa ces empreintes, plus maussades encore, qui réduisirent la main-d'œuvre du doreur de livres à l'ignoble artifice du fer à gaufres ; mais de ces deux ou trois années de perfection presque achevée qui le consumèrent, et pendant lesquelles il s'est reporté avec un habile courage aux beaux jours de Derome, de Padeloup, de Du Seuil, d'Anguerrand, de Boyet, de Le Gascon, pour les surpasser en les imitant. Les noms que je viens de citer sont ceux des maîtres de cet art, qui a cela de particulier qu'il n'a pas produit jusqu'à nous plus de trois excellents ouvriers par siècle.

“ Thouvenin est mort quand il arrivait au plus haut degré de son talent ; Thouvenin est mort en rêvant des perfectionnements qu'il aurait obtenus, qu'il aurait seul obtenus peut-être ; Thouvenin est mort pauvre, comme tous les hommes de génie qui ne sont pas hommes d'affaires.”

He died in 1834. An illustration of a binding by him is given in Fig. 30. The material employed is smooth brown morocco, ornamented with exquisite fine tooling in the fanfare style. The insides of the covers are lined with a rich red morocco, the decoration being of the same kind as that of the exterior, but of a different pattern. The edges of the leaves are gilt and gauffed, and the name of the binder is stamped on the back of the volume. The book is Le mystère de la resurrection de notre Seigneur iesucrist, par iehan michel, and was printed at Paris by Verard about 1495. It was purchased by the British Museum in 1847. At the period of the Restoration, Simier, binder to the king, did some work which was not destitute of merit, but which was decidedly inferior to that of Thouvenin. Purgold, the contemporary of Thouvenin and Simier, was an excellent workman, and Capé, who was born in 1806 and died in 1867, was certainly one of the best craftsmen of his day; but the reputation of Trautz, who was born in 1808 at Pforzheim, in the Grand-Duchy of Baden, is greater than that of any other modern binder. He served his apprenticeship at Heidelberg, and in 1833 entered the service of Bauzonnet, his future father-in-law, as gilder, whose partner he became in 1840, when the bindings executed by the firm were signed Bauzonnet-Trautz. In 1851 Bauzonnet retired from the business, and Trautz continued it alone, changing the signature to Trautz-Bauzonnet.

Fig. 30.—Le mystere de la resurrection de iesucrist. Par iehan michel. Paris.
Brown morocco. Bound by Thouvenin. $10\frac{1}{4}$ in. by $7\frac{1}{4}$ in.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to excel the work of Trautz, both as regards the forwarding of the volumes entrusted to his care, and the delicacy and finish of the tooling with which he adorned their covers. He was also noted for the excellence of the materials he employed. All the morocco he used was tanned by the old processes, and not by the aid of chemical agents. While there is but little that can be called original in the conception of his designs, he did not copy the great artists of the past quite so servilely as some of his fellow-craftsmen; and it is said that he employed so great a variety of tools that no two of his bindings are exactly alike. Examples of his work are greatly prized by collectors, and they realise very high prices. One fetched 6,880 frs. at the Pichon sale in 1869. Trautz died in 1879.

Cuzin, whose bindings are considered by some to equal those of Trautz, Niedréc, Duru (see the very fine example of his skill represented in Fig. 31), Thibaron-Joly, Hardy-Mesnil, Lortic, and Chambolle, who succeeded Duru, were all, as regards the technical accomplishment of their work, binders of extraordinary excellence, but we look in vain for any originality in the ornamentation of their books; the motifs being all taken from the designs of the great artists of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. Mr. Herbert P. Horne, in his admirable work The Binding of Books, makes some remarks on this subject which are well worth quoting: "It does not require any profound critical insight," he writes, "to perceive how futile are these attempts to revive a past style. No man can escape the spirit of the age in which he lives: the modern gilder, in imitating some old binding, is not able, as he supposes, to reproduce the spirit of the original; he only betrays his own want of invention, and his copy remains, for all his labours, the mechanical production of his own time."

Fig. 31.—La grand danse macabre. Lyon, 1555.
Green morocco inlaid with red. Bound by Duru. $10\frac{1}{4}$ in. by 7 in.

The difficulty, however, of escaping from the traditions of the past is not confined to the binders of France, but appears to be universal. The invention of a new style in binding seems as little likely as one in architecture. Still, we venture to hope that some genius may arise who will be able to unite originality of design with the marvellous accuracy and finish which distinguish the work of the present day, and thus make bookbinding once more a living art.

3 2044 011 307 196

This book should be returned to the Library on or before the last date stamped below.

A fine of five cents a day is incurred by retaining it beyond the specified time.

Please return promptly.

~~JUL 14 '60 H~~

JAN '72 H

331

CANCELLED

OCT 2 '76 H

5278651

DENIED
BOOK DUE

FEB 1 1970

